Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted by the Massachusetts General Court memorializing the Congress relative to requiring that preference be given to citizens of the United States in employment on unemployment relief projects financed by Federal funds, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts urges the Congress of the United States to enact legislation or otherwise to take appropriate action to require that preference shall be given to citizens of the United States in employment on unemployment relief projects financed in whole or in part by Federal funds; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith transmit copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from Massachusetts.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 4197. A bill relating to the admissibility in evidence of certain writings and records made in the regular course of business (Rept. No. 1716); and

H. R. 11098. A bill to provide for terms of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania to be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa. (Rept. No. 1717).

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 230) amending paragraph (4) of subsection (n) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10135) to authorize the construction of a model basin establishment, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1718) thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4020) to authorize the acquisition of lands in the city of Alameda, county of Alameda, State of California, as a site for a naval air station and to authorize the construction and installation of a naval air station thereon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1719) thereon.

INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 251), submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on the 12th instant, authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate matters within its jurisdiction, reported it without amendment, and the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 4336) to extend the provisions of section 23 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. MOORE:

A bill (S. 4337) to allow deduction of certain amounts spent on homes in computing net income for income-tax purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. NYE:

A bill (S. 4338) to amend the act of May 25, 1933 (48 Stat. 73); to the committee on Military Affairs.

By Mrs. CARAWAY:

A bill (S. 4339) granting a pension to Lillie R. Willmore; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 4340) to authorize the President to designate an acting High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 4341) to give precedence to certain proceedings to which the United States is a party, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4342) to create a division of stream pollution in the Bureau of Public Health Service, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 4343) to provide for the allocation of funds for flood-control projects and emergency measures for protection against floods; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 238) to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MISSOURI WILLIAMS

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 267), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1935, to Missouri Williams, widow of the late Octavius Augustus Williams, an employee of the United States Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SCOPE OF W. P. A. ACTIVITIES IN FLOOD RELIEF

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of many inquiries being made as to what funds are available and what Federal agencies are at work in extending relief in the flood-afflicted areas, I should like to give to the Senate some information which I have obtained in that direction.

Yesterday I placed in the RECORD a statement of just what governmental agencies were able to do in the way of loans and financial assistance to home owners and farmers and manufacturers. Today I should like to call attention to what the W. P. A. is doing and what it can do in connection with relief in the flood areas.

I am informed that the W. P. A. have nothing to do with food and clothing or supplying funds therefor. W. P. A. work is reestablishing communications and engaging in repair work to streets and bridges.

By Presidential letter just issued the States are asked to submit projects to W. P. A. for replacing bridges and buildings and making permanent repairs to streets.

W. P. A. is carrying on projects with funds made available to other projects sometime ago, thus putting this emergency work ahead of ordinary projects.

In the case of rehabilitation work, the President has authorized the expenditure of $25,000,000, to be used for repairs and reconstruction of publicly owned structures, meaning those owned by Federal, State, city, and town governments. This money has been allocated tentatively to the various States affected by the floods.

Telegraphic instructions have gone out to State administrators advising them how to make application for such relief. In these instructions it was stated that the localities were expected, within their ability, to contribute toward this work of the W. P. A. or to contribute part of the work themselves.

It is my purpose in making this statement to inform Senators just what the W. P. A. is doing and is capable of doing in the present emergency.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator made reference to the fact that the W. P. A. is not supplying food or clothing to those in distress on account of the flood. That is being handled by the Red Cross, of course?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and admirably handled by the Red Cross and by the local agencies. I am sure, if it were necessary, the W. P. A. would respond.

ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT IN ALLEVIATING SUFFERING CAUSED BY FLOODS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, on Friday last I placed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Tribune.

I now desire to place in the RECORD a newspaper account which discloses the prompt manner in which President Roosevelt acted to relieve the suffering and misery caused by the recent floods.

This clipping is from the Washington Post of Sunday, March 22. It shows that the Chief Executive allocated $43,000,000, to be expended by the Works Progress Administration in the stricken areas.

I think President Roosevelt's action might well be contrasted with the position taken by the Chicago Tribune, a leading organ of the Republican Party, in a recent editorial. The Tribune said the flood victims were responsible for their own plight and that little money or sympathy should be "wasted" upon them. The Tribune, in effect, said, "Let the flood sufferers drown." It is fortunate that we have in the White House a man who does not believe that relieving the victims of Nature's wrath is "wasted money."

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Washington Post to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Mar. 22, 1936]

ROOSEVELT ALLOTS $43,000,000 TO W. P. A. AS FLOOD RELIEF FUND—DISEASE OFFERS MAJOR THREAT—PRESIDENT AGAIN DELAYS TRIP—ACTS TO REBUILD STRICKEN AREAS—FOOD, CLOTHING RUSHED TO VICTIMS—NURSES TO GO TO DANGER ZONE

President Roosevelt yesterday allocated $43,000,000 for W. P. A. aid to those who have suffered from the recent flood. This sum was almost as much as the flood-stricken States were asking.

An Associated Press survey showed that 300,000 persons were homeless and that the damage in the various flood areas totaled $300,000,000.

Included in the sum allocated by the President is $18,400,000 set aside last February 29 for flood rehabilitation. The White House announced the money would be used "to fight the threat to health which has arisen in many quarters where the waters have receded."

Mr. Roosevelt's action came after he had received further reports from the flood centers and once more postponed his departure for Florida on a fishing trip. He made arrangements to leave today if conditions in the stricken areas improve, however.

Rescue work still is necessary in New England and Kentucky. Secretary of War Dern and Admiral Cary T. Grayson, chairman of the National Red Cross, told the President.

DISEASE CHIEF MENACE

The swollen turbulent rivers have subsided elsewhere along the eastern seaboard. The specter of disease—principally typhoid fever—now is the chief menace.

More than 37,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs have been rushed into the stricken States to be distributed among victims. The supplies have been sent from the Federal Surplus Commodity Corporation.

In announcing the movement of food the Corporation added that more than 1,000,000 pieces of bedding and clothing made by W. P. A. workers and donated for relief purposes are available for distribution.

An appeal was made by Representative ELLENBOGEN (Democrat), of Pennsylvania, to the President for an appropriation of $50,000,000 for flood relief.

"People in Pittsburgh are standing in long lines and many hundreds are asking for food and many of them are going hungry", ELLENBOGEN said in a message to the Chief Executive.

"Blanket authority" was given W. P. A. Administrator Harry L. Hopkins to restore highways, roads, streets, bridges, sewers, water and electric plants, and other properties on which the floods spent their destructive force.

PUT 250,000 TO WORK

Hopkins reported to Mr. Roosevelt that he could put 250,000 W. P. A. men to work immediately at rehabilitating the 10 States where property losses and human suffering are the heaviest.

These States are Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, and Ohio.

The threat of disease is "exceedingly grave," Dr. William F. Draper, Acting Surgeon General, announced after studying the situation.

Sanitary engineers have been rushed into Pennsylvania and West Virginia to establish chlorination systems where the mucky flood waters have reached public water supplies.

Response to President Roosevelt's plea for Red Cross funds has been "extremely generous," Grayson told the Chief Executive.

If the flood situation allows, the President probably will leave Washington shortly after noon today and proceed directly to Winter Park, Fla., where he will receive an honorary degree from Rollins College tomorrow.

Journeying then to the west coast of Florida, he will board the Presidential yacht Potomac, putting out to sea late tomorrow on a fishing cruise.

He plans to return to the White House by way of Warm Springs, Ga., where originally he intended to stop for a day on his way South.

The situation in the various States affected by the flood, as described by the Associated Press, follows:

Pennsylvania: Governor Earle asking the Federal Government for $10,000,000 flood reconstruction appropriation. Heat, gas, and light still crippled in many eastern Pennsylvania sections. Workmen digging the mud out of houses in several towns.

Johnstown, hit by repetition of historic inundation, seeks $10,000,000 fund for own needs.

Connecticut: More than 2,000 W. P. A. workers sent into flooded areas to help strengthen dikes and bridges and for rehabilitation work as cities and towns direct. Method of financing rehabilitation not yet arranged. State highway department working on plans to restore roads.

Massachusetts: Governor asks $8,000,000 Federal appropriation for flood relief and $6,000,000 bond issue for reconstruction of roads and bridges. Food, clothes, and medicine being provided from $750,000 voted today. Force of 20,000 to 30,000 W. P. A. men now fighting flood ready to turn to reconstruction.

New York: Immediate expense of reconstruction estimated at $5,000,000. Will be financed partly by $2,000,000 flood fund of up-State W. P. A. and in Binghamton area by $55,000 Red Cross money, $26,000 private contributions, and $116,000 W. P. A. fund. State expects to spend up to $500,000 repairing roads and bridges, a force of 5,000 men repairing highways and moving flood fugitives back into homes.

Ohio: Senator A. V. DONAHAY, of Ohio, asserts Congress should provide at least $10,000,000 to aid flood victims in Ohio and other States. Rehabilitation plans for Ohio River Valley not yet definite. Mills, mines, potteries between East Liverpool and Bellaire estimate must spend 10 days cleaning out debris before compute damage.

Potomac Valley: Clean-up starts, preliminary to reconstruction; $5,000,000 sought from Federal funds; $1,500,000 flood-sufferers appropriation and $3,200,000 for roads and bridges pending in Maryland State Legislature.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hesitate to take the time of the Senate at this juncture, but I think it important to have the RECORD straight. All of us will recall that when the recent Virgin Island investigation was taking place, and just prior thereto, numerous articles were printed in the newspapers about "star-chamber proceedings" and "high-handed methods" in the conduct of the United States court in the Virgin Islands, which grew out of the case of one McIntosh, who had made a confession of larceny in the use of certain funds, and then repudiated his confession and went to trial. The case was taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and an opinion thereon has just been handed down. The opinion is not long, and I am going to take the liberty of reading from it. I read first the concurring opinion of Judge Davis:

Davis, circuit judge, concurring.

Two questions arise here: (1) The determination of the department under which the trial court operated, and (2) the fairness of the trial.

The President intended to transfer, and did transfer, the District Court of the Virgin Islands from the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Justice. Thereafter the court, with its officers, functioned, and could only function, under the Department of Justice, and was free from any control whatever of the Department of the Interior. We heard the representative of the Department of the Interior at the argument of this case purely as a matter of courtesy, for, as a matter of right and law, it was a stranger to the proceedings and had no standing or proper place in the court.

The case was listed for trial and the appellant, with his attorney, appeared before the court for trial. No question had been raised, nor has any since been raised, as to the regularity and sufficiency of the charges made against him in the criminal information. The appellant was charged with committing a misdemeanor and was tried before the court without a jury in accordance with the law of the Virgin Islands. When it was called for trial the appellant's attorney answered that he was ready for trial, but the district attorney, who had been instructed by the Department of the Interior to have a nolle prosequi entered in the case, refused to appear. In this situation the trial judge had to decide whether or not he would stop the trial or, with the consent or acquiescence of the appellant, proceed without the district attorney. He chose the latter and questioned the appellant concerning the charges against him. The questions asked were so fair and proper that appellant's counsel did not at any time raise a single objection or take a single exception. There was nothing unfair or prejudicial in the whole trial on the part of the judge in either manner or matter. He was calm, impartial, and simply tried to ascertain the truth.

On the entire evidence, that elicited by the judge and that elicited by appellant's attorney, there can be no real question about appellant's guilt. He was not denied a single right guaranteed to him by the Constitution or any law. A trial cannot be called unfair because the trial judge, in order to ascertain the truth, with the consent of the defendant, asks fair and proper questions.

Under the peculiar and unusual circumstances of this case, the trial cannot be called unfair, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Mr. President, I do not want to indulge an effort to extend the controversy over the Virgin Islands. Perhaps the persons interested are assumed to have acted in the manner they thought wise and just and fair, but it is important that Judge Wilson and the United States district attorney should have printed in the RECORD the fact that their conduct has been exonerated by the circuit court of appeals. I refer to the attorney who held office prior to the conduct of the case which I have just read.

Newspaper accounts emanating from various sources, indicating that there were star-chamber methods and high-handed and unjust and unfair practices in the court in the Virgin Islands, seem to have been completely set aside, and the position of the investigating committee has been fully and wholly sustained.

Mr. McIntosh, on the other hand, has not only been convicted in the courts of the Virgin Islands, but the conviction has been upheld by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. So the question of the guilt of Mr. McIntosh, who certain departments seemed to think was not guilty, has been overwhelmingly proven to have been well-founded in the conduct of the trial in the Virgin Islands.

For the sake of the record, I ask unanimous consent that the opinion of the court in the case tried before Judges Buffington, Davis, and Thompson, of the United States circuit court of appeals, may be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. No. 5799. October term, 1935. Leonard Walter McIntosh, defendant-appellant, v. People of the Virgin Islands, plaintiff-appellees. Appeal from the District Court of the Virgin Islands of the United States, subofficial district of St. Thomas and St. John.

OPINION

(Filed Mar. 14, 1936)

Before Buffington, Davis, and Thompson, circuit judges.
Buffington, J.

At the threshold of this case—an appeal from a criminal conviction in the United States court in the Virgin Islands—we are confronted by a conflict between two branches of the United States Government, to wit, the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice. The Department of the Interior appears before us, by its Solicitor, and, confessing error, asks that the judgment below be vacated and the convicted man discharged. On the other hand, the Department of Justice appears by its Assistant Attorney General and asks that if this court has jurisdiction in this appeal, the judgment below be affirmed. Both sides have been heard on this question of territorial control. In our judgment, we are relieved from deciding that delicate question by the President of the United States, who has issued an Executive order as follows:

"The United States Court for China, the District Court of the United States for the Panama Canal Zone, and the District Court of the Virgin Islands of the United States are transferred to the Department of Justice."

This order establishes the control of the Department of Justice. Assuming for present purposes this court has jurisdiction over the appeal, we pass on to the merits.

In this case it appears that Leonard Walter McIntosh, hereafter called appellant, contends he was unjustly convicted and sentenced in the court below on three counts of an indictment charging him with violation of section 46, chapter 10, title IV, of the Code of the General and Special Laws of the Virgin Islands for the Municipality of St. Thomas and St. John, which provides:

"Every person who knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representation or pretenses, defrauds any other person of money or property is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained."

On entry of a judgment that he pay a fine of $200, he took this appeal.

A study of the record shows the appellant was chief clerk or chief bookkeeper of the local department of public works. In the spring of 1934 he was building a house for himself and a public garage and ran out of needed material. As he then owed the Lockhart lumberyard several hundred dollars and he was apprehensive it would not give him more credit, he resorted to getting the needed lumber from the public works department of the island. His method of doing so is thus stated by himself:

"My carpenters were working—I do not remember whether it was ceiling, the parlor, or the dining room—and they ran out of ceiling lumber, and as I had owed Lockhart quite a lot of money, I do not remember how much, but around that time it was close to $700 or $800, and I could not see my way to keep on purchasing to make my house a bit more comfortable. The idea just struck me that why not get a couple hundred feet of ceiling lumber from the lumberyard and charge it to the public-works department. This I did in the following manner:

"I accordingly issued a requisition on Lockhart's lumberyard and sent a requisition to the lumberyard.

"Q. By whom did you send the requisition?

"A. I do not remember. But I remember this, that I called a truck, which driver's truck number I also do not remember, but I called a Government truck and sent it to the lumberyard and told them to fetch me the lumber from the lumberyard to my home. The quantity of lumber I do not remember, but I do not think it was in excess of 500 feet—I do not think so. It was rush time, working night and day, so I was hard pressed.

"Q. This lumber, you say, Mr. McIntosh, was ordered from Lockhart's lumberyard on a regular requisition form of the public-works department and signed by you?

"A. Yes.

"Q. This lumber, however, never reached the public-works department, but went direct, according to your instructions, to your house via the public-works truck. Is that correct?

"A. That is correct.

"Q. Mr. McIntosh, when did this happen?

"A. I cannot exactly remember the month. If you have any information, I would appreciate your refreshing my recollection.

"(Mr. Baer then read to Mr. McIntosh the statement dated July 6, 1934, signed by Alphonse Callwood, and remarked that the time was about March of this year, and after reading this statement Mr. McIntosh said Callwood was right; that he did tell him to wait at Judge Jensen's house for the truck.)

"Q. Is there anything else connected with it?

"A. I do not remember the date, but I should be able to determine that from the pay-roll records. It may have been Ebenezer Degout, because he is one of the public-works drivers.

"Q. Mr. McIntosh, do you recall having Alfred Heidman, a driver for the public-works department, deliver to your house during about the month of March of this year any cement?

"A. I do. He delivered, I do not know how many sacks, but more or less 10 sacks of cement, which cement was the property of the public-works department. Mr. Heidman received this cement upon my verbal instructions; he took it from the public-works storehouse. This cement was used in my office. He did not receive the instructions from me.

"Q. Who from?

"A. He got the instructions from Reese.

"Q. Who told Reese?

"A. I told Reese."

It also appears that appellant, instead of using his own truck, had a Government truck sent to the Lockhart lumberyard to get the lumber. He told his chauffeur to put the lumber under the house so no one would see it, and, to quote the words of the chauffeur, "He told me to go along with Ebenezer Dugout (the driver of the Government truck) and get the lumber and put it away because he got it from the public works." The lumber was used in building appellant's house.

Without going into details, the proofs also show he got nails and a considerable quantity of cement from the public-works department and told his chauffeur "to put it away so that nobody should see it." The proofs further show that the day after appellant's arrest, he came to Mr. Baer, the then United States district attorney, and said "he wanted to make a confession of the charges filed against him." The testimony of Baer is: "I told Mr. McIntosh immediately that he need not make any statement to me at all; that whatever he said to me may be held against him, and that he should employ counsel. Mr. McIntosh told me he did not want counsel. He said that what he wanted to do was to make a clean breast of everything; he wanted to tell me everything connected with the charges against him with reference to the public-works department." The appellant's statement was taken down stenographically and was produced at the trial and is quoted above. For what happened subsequently, we quote from the brief of the Assistant Attorney General:

"The written confession was never completed. The appellant, in his statement of facts, states that the prosecution nowhere explains why McIntosh was never given an opportunity to complete it. Eli Baer, the Government's attorney to whom the confession was made, stated (R. 54):

"I didn't take any further testimony from Mr. McIntosh because of instructions I received from the Secretary of the Interior. I was ordered to suspend my investigation for a while."

"Mr. Baer's connection with the Government was later severed, and he was replaced by George S. Robinson who, before conferring with any witnesses for the prosecution, stated to the trial judge informally that he desired to nolle prosequi the case against McIntosh (R. 15) and then later made a formal motion in open court for a nolle prosequi (R. 13)."

As noted above, the new district attorney moved for leave to enter a nolle prosequi, which motion was refused and thereupon the case went to trial, the appellant being represented by counsel who stated "Ready for trial." The new district attorney did not attend and no objection was made by appellant's counsel to his not being present. The situation was unusual and the judge, being confronted by a situation where the district attorney absented himself and did not act, and the former district attorney having made the sworn-to information as to the offense with which the appellant was charged, we find no impropriety in the judge proceeding with the trial when the counsel for appellant stated they were "ready for trial." No exceptions were taken to the admission or refusal of testimony and the evidence adduced, if believed, warranted a conviction of the appellant, who was denied no constitutional protection.

Upon careful consideration of all questions involved, we are of opinion the court's judgment should be affirmed. The conduct of the judge in the trial of the case is strongly censured, but a study of the record satisfies us that in this somewhat unusual situation the judge acted with fairness to the accused. He was represented by counsel, who expressed themselves as ready to proceed and who agreed the case was one which could be tried by the judge without a jury. No demurrer was filed, no motion made for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, and no exceptions were taken to any rulings of the judge, to his conduct, nor were any procedural questions raised before him. Notwithstanding the lack of exceptions and the existence of warrant for the appeal, we have carefully studied the record and have reached the opinion that the proofs warranted a finding of the appellant's guilt. Not only was there a formal confession by him, but on several subsequent occasions he admitted to the then district attorney his guilt. His own testimony, explaining away his previous admissions, the evidence of fellow employees that what he did was done by their consent, was given on his behalf; he was allowed postponements of his case; the money fine imposed was less than the money fine and imprisonment that could have been imposed. And these are facts which show there was nothing of ill will, prejudice, or unfair conduct on the part of the judge. Without discussing in detail all of the questions here involved, all of which have had due consideration, we are of opinion the judgment below should be, and is, affirmed and, in justice to the trial judge, we do not feel he acted as a prosecutor, but in accord with judicial duty and in keeping with the standards laid down in many cases.

FLORIDA SHIP CANAL—LETTERS FROM JOHN L. BOGERT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD letters addressed to me by Mr. John L. Bogert, editor of the Marine News, in reference to the Atlantic-Gulf Canal project in Florida.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MARINE NEWS,
New York, March 23, 1936.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You are at liberty to use my letters in any way that will further the interests of water transportation in the United States.

I am proposing to run an editorial showing the absurdity of the claim that the cutting of the Florida canal would adversely affect the agricultural value of the section traversed.

The utter absurdity of any such claim ought to arise in anyone's mind when they ponder on the history of "brave little Holland", whose fertile land reclaimed from the North Sea is all well below the upper sea level, and yet where does one find richer, more productive soil?

If the critics of the Florida canal were hydrographically correct in their animadversions, the "hollow lands" of Holland would be much worse off than the land in Florida adjacent to the path of the proposed canal, since the Florida lands are above the water level, while the "hollow lands" are below.

But why go further into this matter? As the United States engineers have well pointed out, the fresh water which is always falling from the clouds and sinking down into the soil constantly exerts an overflow, outward-flow pressure, and salt water is being pushed away from the substratum of the coast; it never gets a chance with normal rainfall to permeate the soil. Rain will always keep the soil sweet where the region is not arid. Cutting the canal may reduce the outward flow of fresh water along the coast line, but it will not reverse the flow and permit salt water to permeate the soil. It will simply divert the outflow of fresh water from the coast line to the canal. Water of outflow follows the line of least resistance.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. BOGERT, Editor.

THE MARINE NEWS,
New York, March 18, 1936.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I share your grief at the action of the Senate yesterday in refusing to appropriate the necessary funds to carry on the Florida canal.

I am with you in this matter 100 percent. My paper is at the service of all canals and waterways in the land.

Every issue I propose to fight for water transportation. I have pointed out more than once that the big bankers who are heavily interested in the securities of the railroads, having bought into our shipping lines, compel the shipping executives to testify that their lines will not use the canal if dug.

Of course, to the uninformed legislator, that is an unanswerable argument against the digging of what he imagines will be an unused ditch. It was in that way that the railroads killed the trans-Jersey canal.

As you can possibly guess, I have generally been a Republican in national politics, but I am for what I consider the best interests of my State and country before all things.

I am asking a favor of you now. I am anxious to get the names of those Senators who opposed the Florida canal, but last year voted for deepening the St. Lawrence waterway and ratifying the treaty with Great Britain that gave to that foreign country the joint control of the water of our Lake Michigan. Please let me have that list, or rather, the two lists. I want to place them side by side and write as stinging an editorial as I can for our next issue.

As I said before, I am for the Florida canal 100 percent, and against the expenditure of American money to divert from the ports of the Atlantic coast and from New Orleans the exports and imports that belong to this country.

The Mississippi is the natural route of the commerce of the West, and the ports of the Atlantic coast are the natural distributing points for 50 percent of the population of our Nation. Tell them in Washington that you have only just begun to fight.

Yours truly,

JOHN L. BOGERT, Editor.

ADDRESS BY ARTHUR MEIGHEN ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on the 8th of February, before the Canadian Society of New York, Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen, former Premier of Canada, and now a senator in the Parliament of Canada, delivered a very able address on the international situation.

Without regard to whether or not anyone may agree with all the statements made by Senator Meighen, the address contains so much valuable information with respect to international matters that I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I hasten in these opening words to express on behalf of the Dominion from which I come how much we have been touched in recent weeks by the high courtesy of your people as evidenced in the many manifestations of sympathy which they have exhibited following the death of our late beloved King. From one end to the other of this tremendous country public bodies of all kinds—legislatures and even business institutions—have seen fit to mark in one form or the other their appreciation of a great and good man and a righteous King, though of another land, and have tendered to us British people tokens of sympathetic regard which have impressed us much and which we will long remember. King George V was a wise counselor, a man of world-wide interests, and held in his heart nothing but sincere good will for all nations. He concerned himself actively and earnestly with the well-being of all classes of his people, and especially of the unfortunate and afflicted. His character was as noble as his rank, and he was universally beloved. Nothing you could have done would have evoked from us in Canada a response so spontaneous and wholehearted and a sense of gratitude so lively and abiding.

It is with some anxiety that I now venture to address you. We in Canada feel so close and friendly to the people of the United States that we are apt sometimes to forget when over here that we are in another country, and the restraints which that fact imposes. I want to say something on a subject which is, to my mind, common to us both. It touches on your relations and our relations with the world outside and has to do with what might be described as the policy of isolationist neutrality now under consideration or in effect in this Republic. I am sincerely and keenly anxious to keep within bounds of courtesy and good taste and will, indeed, be a victim of remorse if in this respect, under the ardor of earnest conviction, I should fail.

No matter what may be the forms of expression used, it must be understood once and for all that I am speaking only for myself. I am now a member of no government and leader of no party. I may undertake to give at times the generally accepted view of the Canadian people, but whether I give it correctly or not is entirely my own responsibility.

We in the Dominion always assume that you know a great deal about us and understand our ways of looking at matters international, and we think we ourselves enjoy similar advantages with respect to the people of the United States. We assume, rightly or wrongly, that you will listen to us more charitably and more generously than you will to others who are farther away.

The neutrality policy now described as isolationist is not the same character of neutrality policy which has usually been followed in this and other lands. Legislation passed by Congress in August 1935, in anticipation of troubles then brewing across the Atlantic, reflected a decision on the part of the United States to retreat at some distance, as it were, from that stern adherence to neutral rights which has characterized United States neutrality in other years. A firm resolve to keep out of foreign wars has led to a belief that it is better to sacrifice rights and sacrifice interests—individual and national—than to hazard the alternative of being involved in war. Your intention is, therefore, to recede from insistence on rights, privileges, and interests heretofore asserted and usually enjoyed, in the hope that this very receding will take you farther from the scene of conflict and more certainly insure the blessings of peace.

With the object which you have in mind, certainly no one can find fault. The same object is just as precious to us and just as universally desired.

In proceeding to discuss the implications of this policy and how far the goal sought is likely to be attained, I want to lay down at the outset some very simple postulates.

First—and this one is so simple as hardly to need stating—everyone must recognize that the decision is entirely your own. You have a right to make it as you may feel in the best interests of your country, and no one can complain.

Second. We all recognize without the least reservation that the United States has nothing in mind but peace and the triumph of peace. Whatever your policy may lead to, we know for certain the objective to which you intend it to lead. We in Canada make no question whatever of the good faith of this American Republic. Your chairman has just referred to our one hundred and twenty-five years of friendly and intimate relationship; to our unfortified border over thousands of miles. That unfortified border has never caused us concern. Indeed, we recognize that the credit for its existence and for the long era of peace and friendship which has reigned between us is much more yours than ours. You have been the powerful Nation of these years, and we could never, even if we had the ambition, possess adequate means of defense. We cordially grant you full credit for this achievement and have all the reasons that can be furnished by twelve decades of happy neighborhood for trusting in your good faith.

The question I want to put is this: Is a policy of isolationist neutrality likely in the end to contribute to your well-being and your freedom from war?

Obviously an isolationist attitude is not new. It is a natural state of mind into which nations fall who are tired of the turmoil and follies of competing international ambitions. Over and over again it has appealed to statesmen of different countries as a sane and proper refuge after years of tiresome entanglements and strife, but even in days when the world was bigger and nations were farther apart than they are now, all plans designed on the idea of isolation have one by one been abandoned. At least it can be said that no great nation has been able to pursue that happy course for long.

There must be some reason and some very powerful reason why this has been the case.

An eminent citizen of this country, Mr. Charles Warren, Assistant Attorney General of the United States at the time of the Great War, has lately given the world an analysis of the experiences of his country during that conflict, while it was pursuing with all the steadfastness of which it was capable a policy of neutrality. Mr. Warren's recollections of those years and his long study given the subject brought him to the conclusion that the security of the United States is best promoted by friendly co-operation with other nations on this globe; by seeking tranquillity for itself along the path of world tranquillity; by helping to secure collective decisions and collective action in the maintenance of peace. Mr. Warren has set down no less than twelve conditions which must, in his judgment, be lived up to if any alternative policy of isolationist neutrality is to be pursued. Most of these conditions involve sacrifice of neutral rights. I am not arguing that such a sacrifice is not wholly capable of defense and indeed might not be worth while if by that means the larger goal could be reached. Peace is an ideal, noble and worth while. In this age of vast mechanisms and appalling scientific discoveries it is an ideal vital to the world, and it is worth a lot of sacrifice. What I call attention to is that the conditions set out in Mr. Warren's catalog are not likely to get you very far in steering this or any country away from the maelstrom of war. They provide for definite resolutions to be taken by the American Nation; for statutes to be passed forbidding this, that, and the other thing. Submarines are not to be allowed to enter American ports; enemy aircraft must be forbidden to land on American territory or fly over lands or waters under American jurisdiction; ships are not to be allowed to carry implements or provisions of war to vessels of belligerent countries wherever they may be; passengers are not to be protected if traveling on belligerent ships or on any ships equipped even for self-defense. All these things are to be done so that dangerous situations may be avoided.

When the last war was raging great nations were fighting for their lives. They were grasping at every means to crush the enemy and save themselves. They were impinging here and impinging there and more and more on neutral rights, going in every case just as far as they dared to go in order to help themselves survive. None of them wanted to incur the enmity of other lands—least of all the enmity of the United States. None of them were so foolish as to seek to add to the numbers of their foes, but the very necessities of war drove them in one direction today and another direction tomorrow; encroachment followed encroachment; nation after nation was dragged into the fire, and finally your great Republic decided that if the name of honor was to mean anything to the United States this country, too, had to vindicate its honor on the field of battle. Have you any reason to believe that human nature will have changed when the next war begins? Have you any reason to believe that, however far you recede in your abnegation of rights, a belligerent country battling for its existence will not press you back to the very last concession and away back beyond that concession if it thinks it can save its life by some advantage? You point then to your statute which refuses to submarines an entry into American waters. You point to your prohibitions against belligerent aircraft flying over your territory. You point to your warnings against traveling in dangerous seas, but you wake up and find the submarine has come; you find the aircraft has landed and even refueled on your shores in spite of your prohibitions. What then are you going to do? You learn some morning that a big passenger liner without ammunition and without even a place for a gun has been sunk in the darkness of the night and that American citizens have been torpedoed by thousands into eternity. At such a point what will be the value of your statutes? At such a point people of this great land will reflect that this only is what has occurred time and again in the long history of mankind.

Do you tell me that after such an event you will still be at peace? Do you tell me that after a succession of such events you will be quietly exploring in what direction you can still farther withdraw? Do you tell me that after humiliation follows humiliation your people will still be flocking to the banner of isolationist neutrality? Forgive me if I speak plainly. I know you will do nothing of the sort. This country never has behaved in that manner and never will.

Again I ask you: Is there any reason to believe that the spirit of war and the practice of war in this ever-narrowing world is going to be more merciful and more considerate in days to come than it has been in the past? Is it not about as certain as anything can be that the very contrary will be the fact—that ever-expanding and ever-spreading methods of transport, accompanied by ever-widening and intertwining interests of all big countries in the four quarters of this globe will bring every one of them within the compass of a great conflict, no matter where it starts? What the British Empire has had to decide and what this country will have to decide is whether the way to keep out of war is to help peace-loving nations wherever they may be to see that there is no war. With every respect I beg the liberty of suggesting that the true path to tranquillity for this Republic is the path of world tranquillity and that all other paths are vain.

A feeling prevails that all these disputes over which nations seem determined to fight in other parts of the world are really no concern of yours and ours. Even if it be true that they are not, the result, nevertheless, is much the same to us as if they were our concern. The cause of the conflict matters little, but its consequences fall everywhere on the just and the unjust as soon as the conflict is on. But is it really true that we on this continent—either Canada or the United States—have any right to look in scornful mien across the Atlantic or the Pacific and conclude that people who battle over these things which don't seem to concern us are inferior people, people with whom we cannot agree and whom we cannot help to keep out of trouble? Let us look just now at Italy and Ethiopia.

What one has to do if he really seeks an enlightened view of the interest of other nations in that conflict is to penetrate to the actual causes of its outburst and see whether or not other nations have an interest in those causes. Wars may be started by an incident, a mere spark may light the flame, but behind the incident there is always a background which accounts for the aggressor taking upon himself the frightful risk of war.

Italy talks about injustices to her citizens in Africa; she talks about her mission to extend the borders of civilization; but, surely, everyone knows that deep down in the hearts of leaders of the Italian people is a determination to extend Italian territory, to enlarge Italian resources, and to open up opportunities for the crowded masses of Italian subjects. I make no excuses for the conduct of Mussolini. He has not scrupled to flout the honorable engagements of his country. He has broken its bond in the Kellogg-Briand Pact. He has violated the covenant of his country with the League of Nations. He has ignored his special agreements with Ethiopia and launched a heartless attack on an almost defenseless people, and he has done all this against the warnings of a well-nigh united world. But what is the lesson to be learned? The lesson is that if there are powerful basic underlying necessities, if there are urgings that grip the very soul of a nation, these things either have to be met and satisfied or they are going to break out in bloodshed, which only a united world, armed for the purpose, can restrain.

Italy finds herself with a congested population; she finds herself bereft of those vital resources which enable a congested population to exist; she has forty-odd millions of people on a narrow strip of land—most of it unproductive—three hundred and sixty to the square mile. Industry depends upon raw material; commerce depends upon certain definite and all-essential resources, and with these Italy is sparsely endowed. She has six tons of coal per unit of her people against over seventy thousand tons which we have in Canada and against a vastly more impressive total in quality, if not in quantity, which you have in the United States. Of iron ore she has only a pittance, one-fifth of a single ton for each person. We in Canada have fifty-eight, and in the United States you have huge reserves, and of finer grade than ours. Italy is not only without iron and without coal, but without cotton, without oil, without copper, without wool, without nickel, without lead, and without either rubber or tin. There are, of course, those who say these things can be bought. On certain conditions they can, but even then the buyers lose the advantage of possession and production. But these people cannot buy without money or without purchase of their own products by us. Italy's revenues from outside sources have been cut in half through exclusion of her emigrants by other countries and by virtual prohibition of her exports in the tariffs of other nations. Her tourist income has gone down. Her population expands, increasing four hundred thousand per year. Her standard of living is only two-thirds the standard of France, one-half the standard of Germany, and one-quarter the standard of England. It just cannot be compared with the standard in either Canada or the United States. About 1,900,000,000 human beings inhabit this planet. Statisticians tell us that on the scale on which the average man lives on this continent there is room only for 1,000,000,000, but that on the lower standard of Europe and Asia there is room for 2,500,000,000. We cannot afford to look down with scorn upon the reflections of great nations who live on these lower standards and who do not think it quite right that conditions which compel them to do so should be regarded as eternal and not subject to alteration either by reason or by force.

I don't for a moment believe that thinking people in this country can feel themselves without any concern in these formidable and elemental causes of world unrest. You are happy here in the possession of a domain of hemispheric dimensions. Your numbers, though great, amount to only thirty-eight people per square mile. You have a geological heritage enormously rich in essential metals, both precious and base. Your soil for the most part is fertile. You have everything, or nearly everything, that Nature can contribute to industry and the fruits of industry. We in Canada are similarly endowed, and our population is sparse. How can it be said that we have no interest or that you have no interest in those gigantic facts and forces which throw out of balance the scales of racial and national advantage, and as a result threaten from time to time the peace of nations?

There are scores of millions of mankind, virile, valiant men, some of them congregated in the Orient, others crowded together on the northern shores of the Mediterranean, all of them denied by geography and the innate selfishness of men an outlet for their energy and their enterprise, an access to those unused and abundant stores with which Nature has blessed the fortunate inhabitants of newer lands. I said a moment ago that these powerful and restless countries cannot be despised because they are not content that this state of affairs should be considered as crystallized forevermore. They are not to be despised because they look for a solution of their troubles around the council table of reason or on the battlefield of force.

I am not contending that in all respects Italy has reason on her side or that Japan has reason on her side. Mussolini discourages emigration and extols the virtues of war. What I am contending is that there are forces fundamental and tremendous disturbing the minds of these peoples, and bound to disturb their minds through the years which are ahead of us, and that in these forces we in Canada and you in the United States have a vital and even a predominant interest; that in the ultimate we have the most to lose; and that whether we like it or not we have to address ourselves to the task of meeting the situation by contact, conference, and compromise, or by resistance in arms.

Do I hear someone say, "These things are not the real causes and motives which bring on war"? What actually happens, it is said, is that ruthless, bold men in positions of power are moved by thirst for glory; they want to secure for their country and for themselves a place in the sun; they dare everything to attain that end. Suppose we grant that this is the truth—and without doubt sometimes it is—is not the consequence just the same? Is not the necessity for prevention just the same; and is there any means of prevention in this tough old world of ours except by bringing to bear a collective will and showing in united phalanx a collective power, of which alone these glory seekers are afraid?

Whichever path we choose, we ought surely to move together and move collectively rather than separately and in conflict. We cannot assume any role of exalted unconcern. We cannot be content in the complacent assumption that others will solve these matters for us and that all we have to do is look on. If we like the path of reason best and not the path of force, we ought then to sit down and reason together with other powers in other parts of the globe and try with them to find a way out. If we cannot, then we ought to stand together with other powers in other parts of the globe and prepare to resist the upsurge of bereft and discontented or reckless nations with whom we cannot agree.

This is the message which I dare to bring. There was a time when the six score millions of this Republic were more favorable to the thought I have tried to expound than they are today. There was a time right in the wake of the Great War when, if overwhelming evidence is to be believed, these forty-eight United States felt much as we do now. This was on the morning after the war. Since then memories have faded and old habits of mind have returned. I venture to ask you to reflect that fading memories do not alter facts, and habits of mind must be made to conform with the world as it is today.

There seems to be an idea prevalent in this Republic that Great Britain has immense territories which can be used for purposes of adjustment and allocation, and that it is Great Britain who should open the gates to the thronging overflow of populations of other lands, and thus restore something like a balance of possessions. This idea has been taken up in certain academic circles of this country, and books have gone out driving the suggestion home. It seems impossible to get other nations to realize that British Dominions are masters in their own households; that Canada is not the possession of Great Britain but the possession of the Canadian people; that the same applies to Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, and in all essential features to India; and that the very might and glory of the British Empire arises from this very truth. If there is to be any compromise affecting Canadian soil, we are the people who have to be dealt with. The problem is ours; it is not the problem of England. The same is true of every dominion; and, indeed, it is true of every colony whose lands any others would want. We have to get over the habit of assuming that the responsibility lies on the shoulders of old England, where eight hundred people are gathered already on every square mile and who already assumes a share of the white man's burden unequalled in the family of nations.

Canada is a peace-loving country. Why wouldn't it be? The United States is a peace-loving country. Why wouldn't it be? But don't let us think that we have a monopoly of this aspiration. Don't let us think that in our interests, in our hopes, in our common sense we are all alone in this world. The Frenchman can think as well as we can. He is just as good a man as the Anglo-Saxon and no better. Do you imagine the Frenchman doesn't know that all he needs is to be left alone? We accord you, the people of Britain accord you, with unreserved sincerity, a genuine dependable purpose of peace, a determination ever to live in amity with all countries. The British people don't look with envy on your strength; they rejoice in your strength. They don't want at any time curtailment of your arms except insofar as curtailment can be made to contribute to world disarmament. No article of British policy, no shilling of British expenditure has any relation to the God-forbidden idea that there could ever again be war between these nations. Does anyone doubt the sincerity of Great Britain in her herculean efforts to hold the world steady at this time? If so, I am sorry for such a man; there are fantasies too irrational to be worth discussion. And Britain, France, the United States, British Dominions, even all these are not alone on the side of peace. There are others—many others—all over the planet, just as earnest in this cause as we are.

I am not even remotely in the councils of any government, but I know there is a floodtime in the affairs of men which it is perilous to neglect. Look around, I beg of you; look around! Can there be any question in the mind of serious people that that very floodtime is now? At this hour when the sky is dark, at this hour when already in two sectors of our globe there is heard the thunder of alien arms, at this hour when there gleams before the shuddering gaze of distraught and wasted humanity nothing plain but the way of blood, surely this is the time when all who love peace, not part only, but all, should do something to bring it about. Surely, this is the time when the resourcefulness of every nation should be summoned and the united action of every nation invoked to find a way of life.

There is not an intelligent reflecting mind anywhere that is not even now overwhelmed with distress. Are we going to have to wait until another terrible price is paid, another more ghastly, more crushing, more ruinous than the last? Are we going to have to wait until the young manhood of another generation has been ground out under the guns, until the ghoulsh devices of destruction and pestilence have spread fire and death through home and nursery, field, and factory, and bleached the face of the earth? No. We cannot dare to give up hope. It is hope we cling to, hope for a getting together of hearts and brains and unselfish might, to the end that sanity may yet prevail, hope that the chords of confidence, cooperation, and good will may soon be struck and another chance given mankind. For this, I fear, we cannot much longer delay.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11418) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, before proceeding with the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona I should be glad if the Senator would temporarily withdraw that amendment in order to permit the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to offer an amendment which he was requested and directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer.

Mr. HAYDEN. I withdraw temporarily the amendment submitted by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona withdraws his amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 25, after the name "Columbia", it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, is authorized to detail annually not to exceed 10 employees of the Weather Bureau for training, at civilian institutions, in advanced methods of meteorological science; Provided further, That such employees shall continue to receive their regular salaries during the period of training and shall not lose their individual status or seniority rating in the Weather Bureau during such period; Provided further, That not to exceed $4,500 annually may be used from any appropriation of the Weather Bureau to cover tuition and traveling expenses incident to such training.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to permit the Weather Bureau to do what the Army and Navy and certain other departments do, namely, to send an occasional employee to some technical school to ascertain what advances have been made in weather reporting and meteorology. It was brought out in the hearings before the Committee on Safety in Aviation that we are not so progressive in this country as we should be in providing means of protection against accidents due to bad weather. Competent witnesses, including the Chief of the Weather Bureau, indicated very clearly to us that it was important to have the privilege proposed to be provided, and, therefore, the amendment is offered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment proposes legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah urges his point of order, let me make clear to him exactly what is intended by the amendment.

There are sections of the country, including the Senator's own State and other portions of the West and Northwest, where the reporting done by the Weather Bureau is very deficient, by reason of the absence of stations. That is particularly true as regards the area between Salt Lake City and Los Angeles over Death Valley. There is an utter lack of Weather Bureau protection in that region. We have to do one of two things: We have to limit aviation and ground the planes or else provide safety for them so far as we can. A rather absurd situation exists in the long stretches of open spaces in the West where the weather reports in many instances are given by farmers who are locally wise in their knowledge of weather conditions. Of course, that is a most unscientific and unsafe procedure. If we are going to advance in commercial aviation it is necessary to have ample protection. That has been provided for by an amendment offered on the floor and adopted.

Further, it was brought out in the beginning by Mr. Guggenheim, son of the Mr. Guggenheim who founded the Aviation Institute and who has put millions of dollars into the study of aviation, that our meteorological methods are far behind those of other countries. He advanced the idea that some of the experts ought to visit other countries with a view to gaining the knowledge which other countries have in this direction. The Chief of the Weather Bureau made it clear to us that at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and other institutions in our own country courses are offered and training to be had quite the equal of anything offered abroad.

The amendment is offered in the interest of safety. The maximum charge that can be made against the Government is $4,500 in 1 year.

Mr. KING. May the charge become progressively greater?

Mr. COPELAND. No; it cannot become progressively greater because the amendment itself limits the number of those who may receive training for the purpose in mind. The appropriation proposed is merely to pay the traveling expenses and tuition of those who may be selected. The amount cannot become progressively greater.

I am sure, from our studies in the committee, that it is a very necessary thing to do. If it were to involve $50,000 or $60,000 a year, or if it could increase to a large amount, I should not favor it, but it is definitely limited to the expenditure of $4,500 a year. I sincerely believe it is a very important thing to be done and that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am still persuaded that the point of order is well taken, but I appreciate the vital importance of doing all we can for the protection of commercial aviation. It may be that the amendment which has been offered may improve the situation and may be advantageous not only to those engaged in commercial aviation, but to those engaged in the protection of the United States and our coastal defense.

I withdraw the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York in behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 36, line 14, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$1,173,454" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,179,454."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is in the nature of an amendment to a committee amendment which has been agreed to. It will be necessary first to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 36, line 14, was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the vote may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 36, line 14, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "$1,173,454" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,179,454", so as to make the paragraph read:

Fruit and vegetable crops and diseases: For investigation and control of diseases, for improvement of methods of culture, propagation, breeding, selection, and related activities concerned with the production of fruits, nuts, vegetables, ornamentals, and related plants, for investigation of methods of harvesting, packing, shipping, storing, and utilizing these products, and for studies of the physiological and related changes of such products during processes of marketing and while in commercial storage, $1,179,454, of which $3,600 shall be immediately available.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 95, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$17,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,228,000", so as to make the paragraph read:

ELIMINATION OF DISEASED CATTLE, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

For carrying into effect the provisions of section 37 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. pp. 750-793), $25,228,000 of the unobligated balance of the funds appropriated by Public Resolution No. 27, Seventy-third Congress, and reappropriated by said section 37 of the act approved August 24, 1935, together with any unobligated balance of the appropriation made for the same purposes for the fiscal year 1936 by said section 37, which balances are hereby continued available for obligation during the fiscal year 1937, for the elimination of diseased dairy and beef cattle, including cattle suffering from tuberculosis or Bang's disease, for payments to owners with respect thereto, and for other purposes, as authorized by said section 37, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of field work outside the District of Columbia, and other necessary expenses.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, Senators will no doubt recall that provision has been made in several acts of Congress at past sessions for the eradication of bovine diseases. The purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to continue the programs for the eradication of Bang's disease, otherwise known as contagious abortion and mastitis, at the same levels at which they have been carried on during this year.

I should like to emphasize at the outset that the amendment does not propose an appropriation of new money. It merely provides for a reappropriation of funds which have already been appropriated by Congress during past sessions. The authorization to use these funds, which are in the Treasury, appropriated and set aside for these purposes, will expire on the 1st of July next unless the amendment shall be adopted.

I desire also to point out that $17,500,000 plus $3,000,000 reappropriated from these funds, as provided in the bill when it passed the House and as to which the Senate committee made no change, the break-down as presented to the House of Representatives and the Senate committee is somewhat as follows:

Out of the $20,500,000 proposed to be reappropriated, $11,350,000 would be available for the continuation of the Bang's disease eradication program; $7,500,000 for the purchase of dairy products; $1,500,000 for the continuation of the program for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis; and $150,000 for experimental purposes in connection with bovine diseases.

The estimates which have been furnished to me indicate that in the fiscal year 1935-36 there will be expended $18,467,825 for Bang's disease and $610,000 for mastitis, making a total of $19,077,825 which will have been spent by the first of June 1936 for these programs for the eradication of the two bovine diseases I have mentioned.

It is apparent that under the reappropriation as provided in the House bill, only $11,350,000 is provided for Bang's disease. Therefore, if it is the desire—as I hope it is—on the part of a majority of the Senate to continue this very valuable work for all those interested in the production of cattle and in dairying, it will be necessary to increase this $20,500,000 of reappropriation recommended by the House and by the Senate committee to the extent of $7,728,000, which is the amount my amendment provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator read his amendment. If it is not long, would he mind reading it again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It simply changes the figures $17,500,000, found on page 93 of the bill as it passed the House and was reported from the committee, to $25,228,000, or an increase of $7,728,000; and I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I was trying to make it clear that this is not an appropriation of new money. These funds have already been appropriated at past sessions of Congress. They are available for the purposes set forth in the Jones-Connally Act and in section 37 of the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act which passed at the last session of Congress. The total of funds that were appropriated and that will expire on the 1st of July, if no reappropriation were to be made at all, is approximately $32,000,000.

I am not suggesting that all of the unexpended balances be reappropriated. All I am urging is that the Senate shall take action which will ultimately result in the continuation of the Bang's disease program and the mastitis program at the same level at which the programs have been carried on during this fiscal year, instead of following the recommendations of the House and the Senate committee, which would provide for a reduction of $6,500,000 in the Bang's disease program and an entire abandonment of the program for the eradication of mastitis.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a great deal of sympathy with the proposal of the Senator; but I wish to call his attention to the fact that the bill not only appropriates $17,500,000 but it also appropriates and reappropriates about $3,000,000 more, making the amount about $20,500,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; that is true. As I pointed out, however—I think before the Senator came into the Chamber—the breakdown of this total appropriation, as given to both committees, indicates that only $11,350,000 will be available for the continuation of Bang's disease eradication, and no provision is made for the continuation of the mastitis-eradication program. It will, therefore, be necessary to provide an additional $7,228,000 out of these funds that have already been appropriated if we desire to continue these campaigns at their present level of activity.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator state how much money was available for the current fiscal year for this commendable work?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amount which will be available for this fiscal year is $18,467,825. By saying "available" I mean that is the amount that it is estimated will be expended during this year for the eradication of Bang's disease, and the Department will have spent about $610,000 for mastitis during this year. There would be a balance, if none of these funds were reappropriated, of approximately $32,000,000 remaining out of the past appropriations which Congress has provided for this work; and I reiterate that all my amendment would provide is a continuation of the Bang's disease and the mastitis programs at the same level of activity at which they have been carried on during the past year.

Mr. President, Bang's disease, or contagious abortion among cattle, is one of the most serious diseases that confront the producers of cattle and dairy products in the United States. Over 10 years ago Dr. Mohler estimated that the loss from Bang's disease to the cattle and dairy producers of this country was approximately $50,000,000 annually. Other authorities have estimated that the annual loss to the dairy farmers and to the cattle producers of this country reaches the staggering total of some $130,000,000 annually.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the Senator prepared to supply the Senate with information as to the progress that has been made in the treatment of these two diseases?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am going to come to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. The Senator may take up the matter when he is ready.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For just a moment I desired to emphasize the terrific loss which is being sustained by both the producers of dairy products and the producers of cattle products.

Numerous studies on this subject have been carried on by competent authorities at various agricultural experiment stations. When all summed together, they indicate that Bang's disease reduces milk production 22.5 percent; that it reduces the calf crop 40 percent; that Bang's disease decreases calving efficiency by 40 percent. These investigations further show that Bang's disease-free herds calve on the average every 11½ months, whereas herds infected with Bang's disease calve only every 20 months.

Bang's disease is also a contributing factor in producing mastitis and joint trouble among cattle. These investigations further show that one out of every five cows which have become infected with Bang's disease, and have aborted, become sterile.

When this matter was before the Senate at the last session of Congress, I presented to the Senate excerpts from letters received from the official State agencies. I shall not at this time trespass upon the patience of the Senate further than to recapitulate a list of the States which have officially indicated their keen interest and desire for the continuation of this very invaluable and important campaign:

Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has desired information concerning the progress of this campaign, and whether it is holding out any fair prospect for the elimination of this dread disease among cattle.

In this connection I wish to refer to official information which has been furnished me by the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture and Markets, the State organization which has had to do with the supervision of this campaign in my own State.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question before he proceeds with that answer?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the approximate area affected by these diseases; and has the Senator information as to where the areas are located?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this disease is prevalent in every State in the Union where cattle are produced. I have just concluded reading a list of the States which have officially expressed their vital interest in the continuation of this program.

Referring further to the question of whether or not this program is proving successful, I desire to read briefly from this report:

Thirty-three thousand five hundred and seventy herds, which were given the initial test, disclosed 15,538 infected herds in the State of Wisconsin. On the first retest of inspected herds 70 percent of the initially infected herds went clean.

In other words, after the first test had been given to these herds and the reactors or animals demonstrated to have had the dread disease had been eliminated, on a second test 70 percent of those herds were clean of the disease.

Only 30 percent of the herds showed any reactors whatsoever on the second test. Subsequent retests of the still remaining infected herds continued to show a further decline in herd infection.

At this point I desire to quote from the testimony of Dr. Mohler, who is at the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, which has served under this Federal program as the directing agency for its conduct. Speaking of the country generally, Dr. Mohler said:

The first test showed over 40 percent of all the herds in 28 States affected, and it showed the percentage of animals in those herds as between 14 and 15 percent infected. In the second test that percentage was cut down to around 5 percent, and on the third test it was further reduced to 3 percent.

Showing conclusively, I think, that if this campaign is carried on it will serve to eliminate one of the greatest handicaps, from an economic standpoint, which today confronts the producers of cattle, including the producers of dairy products.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. When were these diseases first made known, and when was the first effort to check them made by Federal authorities?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, Bang's disease, or contagious abortion, has been known in this country for a great many years. The first reference to the disease which has been brought to my attention was contained in an article printed many years ago in a publication called The Cultivator, in Albany, N. Y., in June 1843. Of course, I would not say that at that time they knew as much about the disease as we now know, as to its infectious character, and what caused it, but this article in 1843 dealt with the manifestations of the disease and the danger which it would ultimately present to the dairy and cattle industries unless it were checked.

The first efforts on a large, national scale, supported by the Federal Government, were undertaken as the result of an amendment which was attached to the so-called Jones-Connally Act, which the Senator will remember was passed by the Congress during the session before last.

In Wisconsin there are approximately 180,000 herds of cattle. Ninety-seven thousand of those herds are now free from the disease. One test will free an additional 58,000, which means that 155,000 of our 180,000 herds can be placed in the clean column with one test. Then there would be only 25,000 infected herds to be coped with.

It is recognized that the control and eradication problem in the remaining 25,000 herds is more difficult than it was in the herds which went clean of the disease on one test. However, the number becomes so small that, with a large organization at hand concentrated effort could be placed on these herds, which would result in their ultimate clean-up.

The program has progressed sufficiently to point the way to ultimate success in this work without the expenditure of unreasonable amounts of money. It is estimated in Wisconsin, in the light of the latest figures, that if the toll which Bang's disease takes for a period of 5 years were applied to the control and eradication of this disease, it would reduce the Bang's problem to an insignificant basis. The cattle industry would then be in a position to carry on without paying annually the millions of dollars which this disease costs the industry.

One moment, now, for the justification of Federal activity in this field. It is hardly necessary to emphasize the point, since Congress has already inaugurated the program; but it is a fact familiar to every Senator giving me his attention that it has been quite a common practice upon the part of the Federal Government to recognize the necessity for Federal support for the eradication of diseases among livestock where the problems become too difficult for the States or the producers to cope with them. Federal appropriations to carry on a number of disease-control or eradication programs are carried in every agricultural appropriation bill.

In some instances these programs have been carried on by the Federal Government where they had no relation whatever to diseases which were transmittable to human beings. For example, we spent large sums of money for the eradication of hog cholera, when there is no indication that hog cholera is communicable to human beings. We have spent large sums of money for the eradication of ticks in Texas, which produce the so-called Texas fever, but there is very little danger, although there is some, that it may be transmitted to human beings. To combat foot-and-mouth disease we have spent sums of money; yet the incidence of human infection from that disease has not been alarming.

So that upon any basis it seems to me we are justified in urging a continuation of these programs, because in this instance we have evidence from the highest authorities that it is taking a toll of at least $50,000,000 a year from the cattle and dairy producers. Furthermore, there is evidence that it is becoming more and more recognized by the medical profession that this disease is communicable to human beings, and is responsible in some instances for undulant fever. There are some communities in the United States today which have adopted health ordinances providing that the dairy products within their jurisdiction must come from Bang's-free herds.

Mr. President, I should like to point out to Senators who are interested a table which I inserted in the record of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations dealing with this measure, found on page 152 of the hearings—A Summary of the Bang's Disease Control Program, July 1, 1934, to January 31, 1936. In this connection I wish to point out that there are shown in the last column of this table figures as to the cattle on the Bang's test waiting list on January 31, 1936, in the various States of the Union. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read many of these, but I should like to mention that in Indiana there are 67,427 cattle waiting the opportunity to take this test; in Oklahoma, 118,092; in Texas, 150,000; and so on.

One further word. When a campaign of this kind is inaugurated progress is made in eliminating the disease from certain herds, but since the disease is highly contagious, unless the program is carried on at the same approximate level, there is grave danger of reinfection and loss of ground in the direction of eradicating the disease as well as a sacrifice of the money which has already been invested in carrying on the program.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in that connection whether he anticipates that it will be necessary to make an annual appropriation of approximately $18,000,000 for the purpose of checking these diseases?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in that connection I can give the Senator the testimony of Dr. Mohler, who stated he thought it would be necessary for a number of years. He stated no definite figures, and I suppose it would be impossible to do so; but, judging by our experience in the program for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis, it may take a number of years.

We have already, as the Senator well knows, for a long period carried on a program for that purpose, and we have now reached the point where the Department is recommending the appropriation of only $1,500,000 for its continuance, although in past years the sums required have, according to my information, been much greater.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the measure and the nature of cooperation between the Federal agencies and State or local agencies?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as the local cooperation is concerned, Mr. President, if the Senator means the enthusiastic response of breeders and producers and the activity on the part of the State agencies which have had charge of this program, I think I can say that in all my experience here I have never known of a program to receive more enthusiastic response or more wholehearted cooperation.

If the Senator means how much money have the States themselves contributed to the program, I can say that not many of the States have acted, for the simple reason that, as the Senator well knows, many of the States have been in a very difficult situation so far as their financial problems were concerned.

This program was inaugurated in a measure as a means of affording relief for the carrying out of this program during this period of economic distress, when States were not in a position to cooperate on a 50-50 basis. However, there are several States which have taken action in the matter. I understand that in the Legislature of the State of New York there is now pending a bill for an appropriation providing for a substantial sum of money—my recollection is that it is something over a million dollars—for the State's cooperation, and adding money to that which the Federal Government will provide. I feel confident if this appropriation is provided and the program is continued that, as the financial situations of the States improve, we shall find them wholeheartedly willing not only to cooperate with the Federal Government but to assume a portion of the burden of the campaign from a financial standpoint.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. What service or assistance do those States or local units and agencies which have not made appropriations in any sum perform in connection with the work?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They perform the service of supervising, through their State veterinary organizations, the giving of these tests. They arrange with the herd owners for the application of the tests to the herds. The Senator will realize that this program is not a compulsory program. It is one based on the voluntary action of the producer and to that extent, in my opinion, has demonstrated overwhelmingly the interest and the desire of the producers for this service, because there has been no compulsion in it whatsoever.

Mr. GLASS. Is it not compulsory?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No.

Mr. GLASS. Is it not compulsory in that no one can ship cattle alleged to be infected by the so-called Bang's disease from one State to another if there is a reaction?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Senator. Such regulations have never been issued. It is my information that no such regulations have been issued, and it is also my information that there is absolutely no compulsion insofar as this program is concerned. Only those herd owners who desire to have the test applied have had it applied to their herds. The fact that all this work is on a voluntary basis demonstrates the remarkable interest and desire of the herd owners, because so many thousands of them have voluntarily responded to the opportunity to have the test made.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that my own experience has led me to believe that it is practically compulsory, because one is not permitted to ship in interstate commerce any animal which has reacted to the so-called Bang's disease test. Four years ago, as I recall—I will not be exact as to the date—I had a sale of a part of my dairy herd, which now numbers, I think, about 125 cows—all high-bred Jerseys. As I recall the circumstances, four of the cows reacted to the so-called Bang's disease test, which I think is a medical vagary. There had not been a case of abortion in my herd for 7 years, and there has not been one since, making the period 11 years.

As I recall the circumstances, I had to withdraw from the sale four cows which were reported by the veterinarians to have reacted to the so-called Bang's disease test. Two of the more mature cows had been regular producers before they were withdrawn from the sale, and all four of them have calved each year since they were withdrawn from the sale.

One notable fact in connection with my personal experience was that the best cow in my herd, I am glad to say, was withdrawn from the sale. Last year she had twin heifer calves and this year had twin bull calves. That has been my experience with the alleged Bang's disease.

After a certain inquiry into the whole business, and after having spent $5,000 in litigation—which I won—my experience has caused me to become thoroughly convinced that this miserable slaughter of animals alleged to be affected with tuberculosis has cost the farmers of this country an inestimable sum of money and has produced nine-tenths of the abortion which the so-called Bang's disease test undertakes now to specify in the examinations by veterinarians.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the experience of the Senator from Virginia is entirely contrary to that of the overwhelming majority of producers of dairy cattle and cattle generally in this country, and his statement controverts all the expert testimony which is available upon this subject.

Mr. GLASS. The trouble is there is no really expert testimony available.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that may be the Senator's opinion about it, but the fact remains that in those States which have carried on this voluntary program great success has been achieved, as the official records of those States show, in the elimination of Bang's disease in cattle.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. First, I wish to refer momentarily to the statement of personal experience made by the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I recall on other occasions the Senator has given us his very interesting experience as a dairyman. At such times I thought the Senator was speaking of tuberculosis in cattle and not of abortion. I did not know that the Senator's herd was ever tested for abortion.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the test was wholly for tuberculosis.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; the herd was tested for abortion, and my contention is that it is compulsory, because one cannot ship animals in interstate commerce if they react to the alleged Bang's disease test. I never have come in contact with an intelligent veterinarian or even with an ignorant one who has ever seen any Bang's disease evidence.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Wisconsin to yield, which he did, for the purpose of supplementing the inquiry made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] as to the matter of cooperation. As I understand, the cooperation that affects Bang's disease or abortion is that after a blood test is made at the laboratory—and, by the way, some of the States maintain such laboratories at their own cost—and the animal is found diseased the animal is then slaughtered and the owner gets the carcass, which is salable for meat purposes. It is as edible as any other animal, because the disease only affects the genital organs. The Government pays not more than $25 for a grade animal and $50 for a purebred animal. That is the extent of the Federal allowance, and that is the cooperation of the owner. The State's cooperation consists in making the test and maintaining the laboratory.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to say that it is my information that the statement made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that cattle which are infected with Bang's disease are prohibited from being shipped in interstate commerce is erroneous. It may be that some States to which it was desired to ship his cattle may have enacted statutes preventing importation of such cattle, but I know that the statement was made to me, upon what I believe to be entirely reliable authority, that there is no regulation which prohibits the shipment of Bang's disease infected cattle in interstate commerce, although there is a provision that they may not be imported into the United States.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. The same thing is accomplished in another way. The Bureau of Animal Industry of the Agricultural Department goes to the agricultural authorities in each State and causes them to become active, so that they go to their respective legislatures, that do not know anything more about it than does the man in the moon, and prevails upon the legislatures to prohibit the importation into the particular State—the Senator from Wisconsin read a great long list of them—of any cow that has reacted to the so-called Bang's test, which practically makes it impossible for anybody to ship from one State to another State animals which have reacted to the Bang's test.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the list which I read was not of States that have enacted legislation against the importation of Bang's infected cattle. The list I read was of States whose official departments had indicated at the last session of Congress a vital interest in the continuation of this program. If there is any State that prohibits the importation of Bang's infected cattle, it has not been brought to my attention; but I suggested that as the only possible explanation of the Senator's statement, because so far as I know—and I think I have official information—the Agricultural Department has never issued any regulations prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of Bang's infected cattle.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if this amendment applies to mastitis as well as to Bang's disease?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does. It provides for the continuation of the mastitis program at the same level at which it is being carried on during the present year.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say, then, that regardless of what controversy there may be about Bang's disease there can be no doubt that mastitis in cattle is a disease which has been brought to the attention of the public-health administrators and has an important relationship to human health. Farmers are naturally conservative; they do not like to have officials come in and deplete their herds under compulsion, whether they are gentleman farmers or industrial or private or commercial farmers.

Mr. GLASS. Why does the Senator look at me when he makes any such statement as that? [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, in the Senator's case he is both a gentleman farmer and a commercial farmer. I looked at him with both types in mind.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator mean a gentleman farmer is a man who uses his money instead of his hands?

Mr. COPELAND. A gentleman farmer is a man who makes money on the outside in order to operate his farm. That is the distinction I make.

Mr. President, I say the attitude of the farmer, regardless of whether he is a gentleman farmer or any other type of farmer, is conservative, just as conservative as is the Senator from Virginia. I find that the dairy farmers in my State, which next to Wisconsin is the greatest dairying State, are very eager about this program, not eager about it because they are going to make any money, for the amount of money they get for condemned animals is far below the value of similar animals not diseased; but I have here a letter from the dairymen's league, composed, I think, of something like 75,000 farmers in New York State, who are very eager to have this action taken. As the Senator from Wisconsin has said, there is pending now in the Legislature of New York a bill providing a generous appropriation to help carry on the work in connection with the Federal Government.

If I had no other evidence of the necessity for this work than the testimony of Dr. Mohler I should be quite content. Dr. Mohler's work in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease stands out as one of the great contributions to the welfare of the farmer and the welfare of humanity. Dr. Mohler is very insistent that we ought to go forward with this work. I mean "insistent" in the sense that he strongly advocates it within the limitations of the Budget. He is not permitted to say all he would like to say, I dare say, but the fact that he so strongly recommends this action is quite convincing, so far as I am concerned. Then, when I have his opinion reinforced by the desire of the great dairying interests of my State that the Congress should do as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, I am happy to add whatever little influence I have to the adoption of the amendment by the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator from New York for his statement.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DUFFY. Does my colleague know of any group of dairying interests or dairy farmers anywhere who do not thoroughly approve of the program for the eradication of Bang's disease?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the contrary, so far as I know, not only the dairying interests but the cattle producers as well are very enthusiastic about this program, and many of them have gone on record in favor of its maintenance at the present level and in support of the particular amendment which is now pending.

Mr. DUFFY. The reason I asked the question was that was my opinion. I suppose that the State of Wisconsin has perhaps had more experience with dairy matters than have many other States, and I know that all those interested in the success of the dairy farmers of my State seem to be unanimous in their approval of the program for the eradication of both Bang's disease and mastitis.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hold the same opinion.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator from Wisconsin know of any other instance in which the Federal Government has sought to combat a disease of this nature in connection with which it has been expected that the Federal Government would defray all the expenses of the investigation and also the payments to the owners of the animals? I understand the great importance of the treatment of tubercular cattle, which is something that vitally affects the human beings who purchase the milk or the meat of the cattle that have tuberculosis, but never more than $6,000,000 have been appropriated in 1 year for that purpose. The State or the county was expected to pay one-third of the expense of the animal that was destroyed, the dairy farmer who was so materially affected by the destruction of the animal was to lose one-third of its value, and the Federal Government was to pay the other third. In this case, while it is true that much larger sums were spent in previous years, those expenditures were in the nature of relief or emergency appropriations, and in fact, in part were relief appropriations. In this case the Federal Government defrays all the expense, pays $25 for grade cattle, $50 for the purebred cattle, and permits the owner to have the carcass of the animal, which, evidence shows, is valued at approximately $20 in every case. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin think that some State other than New York or Virginia should manifest some interest in this movement and make some appropriation therefor? I understand that Virginia has already made a small appropriation to assist this work and that there is a bill pending in the New York Legislature for the same purpose, but that no other State has incurred any similar expense, and that is in the face of the fact that the revenues of every State of the Union I think showed an increase in the last year over the previous year or two.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. While that is true, I may say to the Senator that there are many States in the Union which are today not in a position to make financial contributions to this program; and I state confidently that if the program is carried on the time will come when the States will make such contributions, and thus help to relieve the Federal Government of the burden.

My point is that, having launched this program and having demonstrated its feasibility and the possibility of its success, it would be tragic to reduce the program at this time and to lose the ground which has been won in part toward the eradication of the disease and thereby to jeopardize the past appropriations used for these purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Just a word in reference to what the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] had to say about Dr. Mohler. I have no criticism to make of Dr. Mohler. The fact is that I have had personal contact with him repeatedly. I have a very high regard for him, but I do not understand that Dr. Mohler is an expert in the matter of alleged Bang's disease. He evidently believes in the findings of people who pretend to be experts, but I do not believe there is any real expert in the matter. I think nine-tenths of the abortions are produced by the tuberculin test; and I have the highest authority—and it is a public record here—of men of international reputation in the health department for my statement that the poisonous stuff used in the application of the tuberculin test has created abortions in herds. I do not believe there is any such thing as Bang's disease, because my own experience has refuted the theory completely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hope that this work, which is of such vital interest to the cattle industry, including the dairying industry, will not be prejudiced because of the experience of the Senator from Virginia in connection with the campaign for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis. I think every Senator is familiar with the attitude of the Senator from Virginia toward that program and toward this program. Nevertheless, nearly every farmer interested in dairying and every cattle producer in the United States disagrees with the Senator from Virginia as to the efficacy and value of the program for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis.

I wish to emphasize what I said in reference to a further suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Virginia, that this program is absolutely voluntary; no dairy farmer, no cattle producer, who does not desire to have this test made upon his herd is required to do so. In this respect the Bangs and mastitis programs differ from the campaign for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis.

Since the Senator made the suggestion that there is a prohibition against the transportation of Bangs infected cattle in interstate commerce, I have had an opportunity to check up with the Department of Agriculture, and they inform me again at this moment, as they have informed me on several previous occasions, that no such regulations have been issued by the Federal Government. It is true there is a regulation prohibiting the importation into continental United States of Bang's infected cattle as well as cattle suffering from a number of other diseases.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. As I have said to the Senator, the same thing has been accomplished in a different way. The Department here has prevailed upon nearly all the States to prohibit interstate commerce in cattle alleged to be affected with the alleged Bang's disease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is my information that there are very few States which have taken any such action and that as a matter of fact Bang's disease infected cattle can enter transportation in interstate commerce throughout the United States.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope the amendment will prevail. I ask unanimous consent that the table to which I referred earlier in my remarks may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Figures from Bureau of Animal Industry records.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the committee examined this matter very carefully and felt that the bill provided quite generously for investigation of the diseases of cattle. In the item which the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to amend, $20,500,000 is appropriated for expenditure in the next fiscal year under the Jones-Connally Act for the treatment of the diseases of cattle and to provide for payments to owners when such cattle are destroyed.

In the past, it is true, during the time when appropriations for relief purposes were reaching almost astronomical figures in dealing with the terrible situation throughout the Nation, larger funds have been expended in combating the Bang's disease; but the committee felt, and still feel, after examining the question, that the States and the individual farmers should manifest more interest in the matter than merely wiring and writing to Washington and asking their Senators and Representatives to appropriate more money for these purposes.

In the treatment of a disease as serious as is tuberculosis in cattle, affecting vitally the men, women, and children of the country, the Federal Government never did undertake to defray all the expenses of purchasing the cattle condemned and necessarily destroyed. In the current year the Federal Government will spend more than $15,000,000 for cattle afflicted with Bang's disease. The Government pays outright $25 for grade cattle and gives the farmer the carcass. It is not like tubercular cattle, because the beef is not affected. The average value of those carcasses was $25. That would make $45 the farmer would get, and every nickel of it from the Federal Government, for the grade cattle necessary to be destroyed, and approximately $70 per head for purebred and registered cattle. It has not been long since purebred cattle could be purchased for that figure.

Mr. President, the committee feel that very generous provision to combat the disease has been made in the bill, and I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, New England is very much interested in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Vermont is especially interested. For many years Vermont has produced approximately three-fourths of all the fluid milk that is sold in the Boston milk market. For many years, or since 1920, Vermont has been improving her herds with a view to improving the quality of fluid milk. The curve has been downward in Vermont where it has been upward generally in the United States with reference to the number of cattle affected by such diseases as are mentioned in this portion of the Agricultural Department appropriation bill.

I desire to read into the RECORD an excerpt from a communication from the Department of Agriculture of the State of Vermont, which shows some evidence of cooperation by the State. I read from a letter to me from the commissioner of agriculture, Mr. E. H. Jones, in which he says:

May I take this opportunity to impress upon you the importance of Bang's disease control work among the dairy herds of Vermont. With bovine tuberculosis eradication drawing to its close, our attention is directed to the insidious disease above captioned, which causes more damage to the dairy industry in Vermont, directly and indirectly, than did bovine tuberculosis. A laboratory has been established within this department by the State, which is being operated wholly under Federal funds. This cooperation has enabled us to make an excellent showing in Bang's disease control work. Upward of 8,000 cattle are now under supervision.

That is signed, as I said, by E. H. Jones, commissioner of agriculture of Vermont.

I should like permission to insert in the RECORD a telegram from W. P. Davis, general manager of New England Dairies.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., March 24, 1936.

HON. WARREN C. AUSTIN,

Senate Office Building:

Representing 23,000 New England dairies farmers, we urge your active support to La Follette amendment to agricultural appropriation bill providing increased funds for Bang's disease and bovine mastitis.

W. P. DAVIS,

General Manager, New England Dairies.

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course, to anyone considering the amendment the question occurs why should we not apply economy at this point in order to be consistent with claims we make that the Government should cut down expenses. My answer to that question is that this type of service must be continuous or the money appropriated for it and already expended will be lost. We must keep ahead of the disease. Both of the diseases referred to are extremely contagious, and unless the work were continued until the diseases were eradicated, it would be an uneconomic undertaking. In other words, true economy as applied to the situation would require a sufficient appropriation of funds to keep the work ahead of the spread of the disease and far enough ahead of it ultimately to eradicate it.

As to the particular time of application I call attention to the testimony of Dr. Mohler, at page 157 of the House hearings, where he said:

The need for intensive investigation of infectious abortion of cattle and swine, both from economical and human health standpoints was never greater, if the most practical, efficacious, and economical means for controlling the disease are to be developed, the danger to human health accurately evaluated, and adequate measures taken to eliminate it.

Again I quote from the statement of Donald Kane, attorney for the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, who was a witness. I read from page 333 of the Senate hearings, where he said:

Bang's disease is a very contagious disease, and we are hopeful that we can clean it up rapidly, because it will not cost as much money if we clean it up rapidly. If you do not work rapidly on Bang's disease you lose the value of much of your work. If you test a first time, and then test them again, if you do not keep right after it, if the money is not appropriated until it is eradicated, and there is a lapse of time between the first and second tests for infection it may do no good, because of the fact that there may be a reinfection in the meantime.

Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD a letter from this witness, which I requested him to write to me, with particular reference to conditions in New England. I call attention in passing to the fact that two of the States of New England not only maintain laboratories, but appropriate funds wherewith to indemnify cattle owners whose cattle are destroyed because of the effort to eradicate this disease. That is, they pay a sum in addition to that paid by the Federal Government for this purpose, and by that contribution they increase the speed of eradication of these diseases.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a letter from this witness, Donald Kane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS' FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1936.

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR AUSTIN: Reference is made to our conversation the other afternoon relative to Senator LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill increasing the appropriation for the eradication of bovine diseases for the fiscal year 1937.

At the present time the Department of Agriculture is spending at the rate of one and one-half million dollars per month for Bang's disease work throughout the United States. This makes a total of $18,000,000 a year necessary for this work. The appropriation bill contains only $11,350,000 for the fiscal year 1937, and it is thus nearly $7,000,000 less than the minimum amount necessary to carry on this work.

During the last year $610,000 was used for the eradication of animals suffering from mastitis, and no provision is made in the appropriation bill for a continuation of this work during the fiscal year 1937.

So far as the New England States are concerned, the following figures will no doubt be useful to you in considering the problem:

As of January 31, 1936, in the State of Vermont 21,044 cattle had been tested for Bang's disease since the program began; 8,571 cattle were under supervision as of January 31, and 361 cattle were on the waiting list; 2.6 percent of all the cattle in the State of Vermont are under supervision for Bang's disease.

In Massachusetts 4,817 cattle have been tested since the program went into effect, of which 3,032 were under supervision as of January 31, 1936, and 178 cattle were on the waiting list; 1.9 percent of the cattle in Massachusetts are under supervision for Bang's disease.

In Rhode Island 904 cattle have been tested since the program went into effect; 496 cattle are now under supervision for Bang's disease, and 18 cattle are on the waiting list as of January 31, 1936; 2.1 percent of all the cattle in Rhode Island are under supervision for Bang's disease.

In Connecticut 11,813 cattle have been tested since the program went into effect, 5,315 cattle are now under supervision, and 43 cattle are on the waiting list; 3.9 percent of all the cattle in Connecticut are now under supervision for Bang's disease.

These four States are quite a bit behind Maine and New Hampshire in Bang's disease work, principally because the legislatures of Maine and New Hampshire have made money available to pay State indemnities for cattle destroyed in addition to the Federal indemnities.

The Federal Government is now paying $25 indemnities for grade cows and $50 indemnities for purebreds. Because of the high cost of replacements, however, these indemnities, plus the salvage, are not high enough to permit the farmer to replace his diseased cattle without loss to himself. It is anticipated that just as the States make available funds for a joint program of the Federal Government on TB they will also provide for the indemnities for Bang's disease. If this were done in the four New England States mentioned there is no question but that the number of cattle tested would increase by leaps and bounds.

For instance, in Maine, which pays State indemnities in addition to Federal indemnities, 29,894 cattle have been tested since the program went into effect, of which the whole number are still under supervision and 1,424 cattle are now on the waiting list, with 14.1 percent of all of the cattle in Maine under supervision for Bang's disease.

In New Hampshire, which likewise makes State funds available in addition to Federal funds, 17,743 cattle had been tested since the program went into effect; 13,906 cattle are still under supervision; and 2,517 cattle are on the waiting list, with 12.1 percent of all of the cattle in New Hampshire under supervision for Bang's disease.

With the exception of the marketing agreement and license for milk in the Boston milkshed, the program for the eradication of diseased cattle is the only assistance which dairy farmers in the New England States have received from the Federal Government. The program is one which is popular with farmers, is economically sound, and is to the best interests of the farmers and consumers both because it is aimed at the eradication of dangerous bovine diseases detrimental to the public health.

Bang's disease is of such a transmissible character that the only way to really stamp the disease out is by a vigilant and determined examination and reexamination of the herds affected. With the appropriation cut down as it now is, the tests and retests which are so necessary if this disease is to be cleaned up will not be able to be made, and I am afraid that a large percentage of the gains which we have made in the control of this disease may be lost.

I trust that we may have your support and the support of other Senators from the New England States in our efforts to obtain adequate appropriations for this work for the coming year.

Very truly yours,

DONALD KANE,
Attorney, the National Cooperative
Milk Producers' Federation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	La Follette	O'Mahoney
Austin	Couzens	Lewis	Pope
Bachman	Davis	Logan	Radcliffe
Bailey	Duffy	Loneragan	Robinson
Barbour	Fletcher	McGill	Russell
Bilbo	Frazier	McKellar	Sheppard
Black	George	McNary	Shipstead
Borah	Gibson	Maloney	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Gore	Minton	Truman
Bulow	Guffey	Moore	Tydings
Burke	Hale	Murphy	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hatch	Murray	Wagner
Capper	Hayden	Neely	Walsh
Chavez	Keyes	Norris	Wheeler
Clark	Kling	Nye	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I rise at this time merely to express the hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be adopted. In fighting Bang's disease and mastitis, we are fighting plagues; and, rather than reduce the appropriations to fight them, we should increase the appropriations.

Nothing I could say would add to the able presentation of the facts made by the Senator from Wisconsin. At this time, when the program is well under way, instead of repressing the program and defeating the benefits that will be gained by accelerating its motion, which defeat would be accomplished by a reduction of the appropriation, I submit that we should be better employed in providing the additional amount of money sought by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. McNARY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD three brief telegrams which I have received from citizens of my State bearing upon this amendment. I may say that they are very strongly in favor of the amendment. The telegrams are typical of various other telegrams I have received from my State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegrams are as follows:

CALDWELL, IDAHO, March 23, 1936.

HON. JAMES P. POPE,

United States Senate:

Please support LA FOLLETTE's amendment increasing money eradicate Bang's and mastitis.

DAIRYMEN'S COOPERATIVE CREAMERY OF BOISE VALLEY.

JEROME, IDAHO, March 22, 1936.

Senator JAMES P. POPE,

Washington, D. C.:

Urge that you support needed appropriation for eradication of Bang's disease and mastitis in cattle in line with amendment to be introduced Monday by Senator LA FOLLETTE. Senate Appropriation Committee recommendation is short $7,000,000 needed to properly carry on this disease-eradication work.

ROY D. SMITH,

General Manager, Jerome Co-op Creamery.

IDAHO FALLS, IDAHO, March 22, 1936.

Senator JAMES POPE,

Washington, D. C.:

Understand Senate Appropriations Committee refused same appropriation for Bang's disease and mastitis as last year. Our cattle almost half tested. Great danger losing benefit money already expended. Farmers in favor of testing program by large majority and will appreciate your efforts behalf same appropriations as last year. UPPER SNAKE RIVER VALLEY DAIRYMEN'S ASSOCIATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] is absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] would, if present, vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BILBO. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. I am informed by the author of the pending amendment that if present the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea", so I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. My colleague the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON] is necessarily absent from the Senate. I have been unable to get a pair for him. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHAY], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mrs. LONG], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are detained in important committee meetings.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on official business at the Department of Labor, doing some research work in connection with the Reynolds-Starnes bill.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—45

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment, on page 57, line 4, was agreed to be reconsidered. It is the amendment having to do with the control of the Japanese beetle.

I may say, in explanation of my request, that yesterday when this amendment was agreed to I was necessarily absent at a meeting of the Committee on Commerce, and did not anticipate that enough progress would be made with the bill so that the amendment would be reached by that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment, on page 57, line 4, was agreed to be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 57, line 4, to strike out "$400,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$221,000", so as to read:

Japanese beetle control: For the control and prevention of spread of the Japanese beetle, $221,000.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this amendment has to do with the reduction in the amount appropriated by Congress for the control and prevention of the spread of the Japanese beetle. The Japanese beetle is an insect which, it is believed, was originally imported into this country around the roots of certain nursery stock imported from the Orient. The beetle has proved to be a most destructive pest, not only to fruit but also to grain.

Because of the activities of the Department of Agriculture in the last few years the spread of the Japanese beetle has been almost completely checked except in certain sporadic instances and isolated localities. In the last year or two there have been a few areas in the United States, notably one in the State of Missouri and the State of Illinois almost immediately surrounding the city of St. Louis, and another area, I believe, in the State of Michigan, in which there have been new outbreaks of the Japanese beetle.

I believe it is of the highest importance to American agriculture—not only to the producers of fruit but to the producers of various grains—to have this pest isolated and its spread checked. During the last year the Department of Agriculture expended on this item $350,000. This year they estimated $350,000 as the minimum requirement for the control of the beetle in the old areas and the isolation and extermination in the new areas which have developed. For reasons best known to itself, the House increased the item to $400,000.

The Senate committee has proposed an amendment reducing the amount from $400,000, as shown in the bill as it passed the House, to $221,000, which, according to the officials of the Department of Agriculture, is a sum absolutely inadequate to carry on the work. There is a danger that it would be impossible to carry on the work in an adequate manner with the smaller appropriation, and the work might be practically abandoned entirely.

One of the great dangers to agriculture would be that we might be thrown back on the system of State quarantine, one State against another, which has not been resorted to during the period of Federal control of this plague. We might be thrown back to the situation which existed, unhappily, a few years ago between the State of Georgia and the State of Florida. The State of Georgia was compelled by State regulation practically to quarantine every agricultural product of the State of Florida.

I submit, Mr. President, that the least that should be done in this matter is the adoption of the minimum recommendation of the Department of Agriculture. Personally, I am not willing to ask to have the Senate restore the $400,000 appropriation inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives, but I do move that the committee amendment be amended so as to strike out the numerals "$221,000" and to insert the numerals "$350,000."

The testimony of the officials of the Department of Agriculture appearing in the hearings on the agricultural appropriation bill before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations abundantly demonstrates the comprehensive quality of this work, the success which has attended the efforts of the Department, and the necessity for those efforts.

With regard to the spread of the Japanese beetle, the testimony shows that in the district in which it has unfortunately been carried in some manner the efforts of the Department in the last fiscal year, with the appropriation afforded for that year, have resulted in a diminution of the infested area, and in a diminution of the number of beetles existing in the infested area.

Mr. President, I submit that in the interest not only of the fruit growers of the United States but of all agriculturists of every sort, it is desirable to restore this appropriation to the amount recommended by the Department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations was not so optimistic as is the Senator from Missouri in regard to the control of the Japanese beetle.

The first appropriation for this work was made in the year 1928, when this insect first made its appearance on the Atlantic seaboard. In that year $515,000 was expended in an effort to check and control the ravages of the insect. From that year down to the present time, substantial appropriations have been made from year to year; and if anything at all has been accomplished in the way of actual control, it is that there has been a slight slowing up of the progress of the insect as it has moved westward across the continent.

The Senate Committee on Appropriation feels that the appropriation contained in the bill is adequate to carry on the investigations in an effort either to discover some insect which will destroy the Japanese beetle, or, through research, to develop some direct method of control.

The committee had very little faith in the practice of stationing young men on the sides of roads to flag down all those who may be traversing the roads in automobiles, and cause them to come to a halt, and ask whether or not they are carrying any shrubbery or bushes which may contain the Japanese beetle, when that beetle can easily fly right past the young men without being seen.

I think the Senate amendment should be agreed to, and I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri will not prevail.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate very long on this matter; but I do wish to read from the testimony of Mr. Strong, in charge of the Bureau of Entomology, before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

After describing in detail various methods by which the spread of this pest has been controlled—that is, by trapping beetles to determine distribution, by scouting sections adjacent to nurseries and greenhouses, by trapping control, by farm-products inspection and quarantine, and by vehicular inspection, which is only one of the various methods adopted to stop the spread of the pest, by transit inspection and by tests for the treatment of regulated products—Mr. Strong sums up the necessity for the appropriation in these words:

There has been the normal natural spread of the Japanese-beetle infestation, as there will be every year. There is not any hope of preventing the natural spread, and there has been some infestation that we found to exist outside of the infested area, some at some considerable distance.

I should say that the previous testimony of Mr. Strong makes it plain that when he speaks of the normal spread of the infestation he means within the infested area, rather than outside, but some new areas of infestation have developed at a distance.

These things are bound to occur. There are so many ways in which the Japanese beetle can be moved out of an area that it is impossible to control every possible avenue of movement.

The method we use is to impregnate the soil with arsenate of lead and then spray the plants with a repellent wherever possible. We also use traps with which to trap the beetle. The section around Erie is a grape-producing area, and we have felt justified, in cooperation with the State of Pennsylvania, in carrying on eradication measures.

We have also had an infestation in the past 2 years in St. Louis, which is the farthest infestation we have had from the generally infested area.

In connection with this St. Louis infestation we have carried on work there by using arsenate of lead treatment in the soil in the past 2 years, in cooperation with the authorities in Missouri and the city authorities in St. Louis.

The number of beetles caught this year was less than the number caught last year.

This insect spends 8 or 9 months in the soil, so it is almost impossible to determine the exact limits of the infestation.

We have reduced the number of beetles in St. Louis by our traps.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that no case whatever has been made for this very drastic reduction over the figures in the House, and no reason whatever has been assigned for the selection of this item as against the other items in the bill for such a drastic cut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to the committee amendment. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 57, line 4, in the amendment of the committee, it is proposed to strike out "$221,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$350,000."

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 48, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "$1,099,152" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,599,152."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement concerning the amendment I have just offered. It relates primarily to the study of forest and range lands. It provides an additional appropriation of approximately $400,000 for those purposes.

I am informed that the Department requested that this sum be allotted and set aside for the purpose requested, but that the Director of the Budget eliminated the item from the request, and it was not transmitted, and is not contained in the House bill.

The amendment I have just offered was sent to the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The committee considered it and rejected it. The amendment is an important one, and relates to very important work, especially in the West and the Southwest.

It will be noticed, on page 48 of the bill, as it now reads, that there is an increase of $1,000,000 over the amount contained in the House bill. I am informed that the $1,000,000 increase relates to the tree shelterbelt and does not apply to the problem with which my amendment deals.

I send to the desk a statement on this subject, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

FOREST INFLUENCES

This amendment will provide for studies of the relationship of forest and range cover to flood control, erosion control, and other phases of watershed protection on forest and range lands. One-third of the land area of the United States is now in forest, and over one-third is in range. Thus the research which this amendment would cover would have application to over two-thirds of the Nation's land area.

The extreme losses which have occurred from floods in the last week throughout the East bring forcibly to the fore the need for following every means available in reducing flood danger and damage. Forest and range cover has already been shown to be an important factor in causing absorption of rainfall and checking run-off. In the East much of the forests has been severely cut, leaving scrub forest or brush which is inadequate to check hard rains such as have done the damage of the last week. In the West there are enormous areas of untimbered land on which herbaceous and shrubby vegetation must serve to check run-off, hold the soil in place, and cause rains to be absorbed.

The problem is of such magnitude and of such importance that a thoroughly adequate program should be under way to determine how forest and range lands can be readily restored to serve effectively in all phases of watershed protection, the extent to which such lands can be used without impairing the watershed values, and what other means can be used to make forest and range lands of greatest service in the control of floods and erosion.

The appropriation bill already adequately provides for such research on agricultural lands under the Soil Conservation Service. This amendment would provide for such studies on forest and range lands in the Forest Service, where the responsibility has been placed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Much of this work in the Forest Service is now being carried with emergency funds which will not be available in the next fiscal year, so that this amendment does not provide an actual increase in new work but simply provides for continuance of these important studies.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the last statement, which is that the work contemplated by the amendment is now actually going on but is being provided for out of emergency funds. When those funds are exhausted the work necessarily will have to cease.

I desire to read to the Senate a letter from the American Farm Bureau relating to this amendment:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1936.

Senator CARL A. HATCH,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HATCH: The agricultural supply bill, now pending before the Senate, contains little in the way of investigations on forest influences. The amount of water absorbed by soils near the place where it falls, the amount of annual run-off, what constitutes effective soil coverages, methods of control of headwaters, and other aspects of forest influences cannot be undertaken in the way of research activities with the very modest appropriation which is now carried in the agricultural supply bill.

Items of investigation which properly fall under the general title "forest influences" are particularly needed in our Southwestern States. There are some peculiar and somewhat regional features of forest studies which, if pursued elsewhere in the Nation, might not be applicable in our southwestern area. This being true, it is all the more desirable to secure adequate research funds for this particular project so that the funds will be large enough to permit at least some additional investigations being conducted in such States as New Mexico and Arizona.

May I suggest that an amendment sponsored by yourself, in an amount approximating $400,000 or $500,000 for the next fiscal year, would be helpful in calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of this particular line of research in forestry matters.

I understand that Senator JOHNSON, of California, appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and advocated $400,000 for this work.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER A. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

I, too, understand the Senator from California appeared and requested a similar allotment.

I think, Mr. President, that is all I care to say on the subject. The amendment is important and should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, in order that the Senator's proposed amendment may be considered, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. HATCH. Then I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted be reconsidered for the purpose of having action upon the amendment offered by me.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I regret to object to the amendment of my good friend from New Mexico, but I feel constrained to object to the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia objects.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 48 was adopted.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the committee considered this question at some length and finally decided that the appropriation contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico would not be justified. It is over and above the Budget estimate; and I wish to point out that the committee and the Senate have already increased the items for the Forest Service by a total of $13,676,139 above the bill as it came to the Senate from the other House.

Mr. President, a number of surveys are being conducted at the present time. A glance through the appropriation bills for the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior will disclose that a great many surveys are now being conducted. The Forest Service is already doing work of this nature, and the amendment merely proposes to expand that work and to make what is now proposed a permanent part of the forestry program.

Now I wish to point out to the Senator from New Mexico an item that appears in the pending appropriation bill for the first time. On page 91, in the appropriation for Soil Conservation Service, we find this item:

Soil and moisture conservation and land-use investigations: For research and investigations into the character, cause, extent, history, and effects of erosion and soil and moisture depletion and methods for soil and moisture conservation, including construction, operation, and maintenance of experimental watersheds, stations, laboratories, plots, and installations, and other necessary expenses, $2,393,776.

I submit, Mr. President, we cannot justify carrying on two parallel surveys, one by adding $500,000 to the already substantial additions made to the appropriation bill for the Forestry Service and another, which is, at least, closely parallel, of $2,400,000 for the Soil Conservation Service that will properly handle this work. I hope that the motion to reconsider, made by the Senator from New Mexico, will be voted down.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in explanation of the item which has just been read to the Senate by the Senator from Georgia, I wish to say that, as was pointed out in the statement read by the clerk, the item does appear in the bill but it relates to agriculture. It does not relate to forest and range lands. More than a third of the lands of the United States are in forest lands and more than a third of them are in range lands. Ample provision is made for agricultural lands, but I am informed there is no provision whatever for forest and range lands. The purpose of the amendment is to make provision where the bill itself is deficient, and I am advised, while it was generally considered in the beginning that the amendment referred to by the Senator from Georgia and the shelterbelt amendment of $1,000,000 would cover the work I have in mind, it is now known that they do not include the survey and study of forest and range lands. The item to which the Senator from Georgia has called attention is not applicable to forest and range purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 48 was agreed to. The motion was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment reported by the committee and adopted, on page 48, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "$1,099,152" and insert "$1,125,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that, in order to have his amendment considered, the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted will have to be reconsidered, and a motion for that purpose has just been rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I regret to object to the request for unanimous consent, but this item of the bill was considered and adopted yesterday, and I feel that my responsibility to the committee compels me to object to the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, I move that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 48 was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, one motion to reconsider has just been voted down by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, my amendment covers only 4 States, while the amendment offered by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] covers the entire 48 States. My amendment involves a different proposition altogether. It proposes an addition to the appropriation for the Forest Service, under the section Forest research, and subsection, Forest influences, for investigations by the Allegheny Forest Experiment Station, first, of the influence of the forests of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland on the run-off of precipitation; and second, of forest management to prevent erosion, floods, and the silting of reservoirs and navigable rivers, and to promote equitable flow of streams or underground waters used for domestic and manufacturing purposes.

The money proposed to be appropriated by the amendment would be expended under authority of sections 1 and 2 of an act entitled "An act to insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote the full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture through research in reforestation, timber growing, protection, utilization, forest economics, and related subjects", approved May 22, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 16, secs. 581a, 581f-581i).

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted, following my remarks on this particular subject, a statement, which was given to me at my request by Mr. R. D. Forbes, entitled "Studies of Forest Influences on Stream Flow and Erosion in the Central Atlantic States."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STUDIES OF FOREST INFLUENCES ON STREAM FLOW AND EROSION IN THE CENTRAL ATLANTIC STATES

Two studies of the influence of forests on the regimen of streams are urgently needed in the States of Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

One investigation should be centered within the Allegheny National Forest, Pa. This national forest was established as the result of the disastrous Pittsburgh flood of 1907, to which the Allegheny River contributed. It is the universal practice on private lands in the upper Allegheny watershed to cut the forests clean, and to rely chiefly upon a sprout growth of hardwoods for successive crops of wood. What effect this practice has upon run-off in subsequent storms is unknown, but the drying up in summer of streams coming from watersheds so heavily burned as to bear only aspen and fire cherry is common knowledge in the region. Twenty-five thousand dollars is needed annually for critical comparisons of run-off from watersheds clear-cut, clear-cut and burned, and cut selectively, both with respect to volume and species. The original mixture of hemlock and hardwoods will be compared as a watershed protection with the nearly pure stand of hardwoods which has replaced it over very wide areas. Such comparisons require studies both of entire watersheds and of all of the complex factors involved—interception of precipitation by tree crowns, evaporation from forest-covered soils, water use by the trees, retardation of snow melt, percolation rates, etc. Both the volume and the silt load of the streams require measurement, and soil and geologic factors must be weighed before any valid conclusions may be drawn.

A second study should be located on the watershed of streams draining into the Atlantic Ocean. Some of these, like the Delaware, are navigable; the Federal Government has spent over $30,000,000 in recent years for improvement and maintenance of a channel in the Delaware. Others have been intensively developed for domestic and industrial water supplies. Among the acute municipal water-supply problems is that of furnishing water to the great manufacturing cities at tide level, and of obtaining literally vital supplies for the smaller cities of the anthracite-coal region, where forest denudation by fire and ax is appallingly complete. Periodic floods on such rivers as the Passaic and Schuylkill cause spectacular damage; the steady silting of reservoirs for power production on such other streams as the Susquehanna and Patapsco may in the long run be as disastrous. The forests on the watersheds of the Atlantic drainages differ from those of the upper Allegheny River, as do the geologic and soil conditions. There are no data whatever on the relative value for stream-flow regulation of forest stands of the different species native to the region, or of lesser vegetation. Yet even inadequate knowledge, applied to critical watersheds, might save millions of dollars in the height of dams now building or projected, or in damages currently suffered from inequable stream flow. The same type of studies is needed here as on the Allegheny River watershed, and the cost will be approximately the same—$25,000 yearly.

Studies of forest influences in the Central Atlantic States should be assigned to the Allegheny Forest Experiment Station of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Although one such motion has been voted down, the Chair holds that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 48 was adopted, for the purpose of offering amendments to it, is in order.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4212) to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, of course the request is quite proper. We would not want to displace the unfinished business. However, I do not know what the bill is to which the Senator from Ohio refers.

Mr. BULKLEY. The primary purpose is to extend the time of the operation of title I of the National Housing Act for 1 year.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before consent is granted, may I ask what the position of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Capper] is with reference to laying aside the unfinished business?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I can answer that question and so can the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary]. The Senator from Kansas has an understanding with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Carey], who is absent, and I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally] has the same understanding, that the Senate will not proceed with the unfinished business until the return of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. McNARY. Yes. He is expected to return on Thursday.

Mr. NORRIS. The understanding is that the unfinished business will not be taken up until Thursday?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. It is my expectation at the conclusion of today's business to ask the Senate to take a recess until Thursday.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the intention of the Senator from Ohio to present his matter at this time?

Mr. BULKLEY. So far as I know, there is no opposition to it. It is unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] that the bill has now assumed emergency proportions in view of the recent floods? People who have been the victims of floods and whose homes have been destroyed would be prevented from taking advantage of title I of the Federal Housing Act if the bill of the Senator from Ohio should not be enacted before April 1. There are many who desire to borrow money from the Government for the purpose of rehabilitating their homes and farms. It is very important that favorable action be had at once.

Mr. McNARY. I am not discussing the merits of the measure, though I am very glad to have the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts. However, the request coming at a rather late hour and unexpectedly, I want to know the reason why the bill should be brought up at this time. Has the bill passed the House?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; it has not passed the House, but it has been reported favorably by the House Banking and Currency Committee. The present authority of the Administrator to make loans under title I of the Housing Act will expire April 1. Consequently he would like to have the measure passed as soon as may be.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I concur in the request of the Senator from Ohio and express my belief that the bill ought to be considered and passed now.

Mr. McNARY. I understand it has received consideration by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and has received unanimous approval by that committee?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. That being true, I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] has asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4212. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 4212) to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the primary purpose of the bill is to extend for 1 year the operation of title I of the National Housing Act, providing for the so-called renovation loans. Under existing law the authority to make those loans will expire April 1, and the bill as reported from the committee proposes to extend that time until April 1, 1937.

Some $315,000,000 has been thus far insured under this title, creating a Government liability of something over $60,000,000. It is proposed by the bill to reduce the amount of insurance from 20 percent of the loan to 10 percent of the loan. It is proposed to reduce the total amount available for insurance in the hands of the Administrator from $200,000,000 to $100,000,000. Inasmuch as more than $60,000,000 has already been committed, this will leave only about $40,000,000 more available for the Administrator.

However, with the liability reduced from 20 percent to 10 percent, the remaining $40,000,000 will make available about $400,000,000 of additional insurance, which is more than the total amount of insurance that has been written up to date.

There are two or three minor amendments proposed. The bill would restrict the loans to owners of real property or tenants having leases for not less than 1 year. It would facilitate the handling by the Administrator of claims acquired against borrowers. It would make it unnecessary for those claims to be handled through the Procurement Division of the Treasury.

I think I have stated the principal amendments. As I have already said, the bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I do not know of any opposition to the bill from any source.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio if the bill is recommended by the Housing Administrator?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; it is recommended by the Housing Administrator. He appeared before the committee and testified in its behalf.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 2 of title I of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended, effective April 1, 1936, to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. (a) The Administrator is authorized and empowered, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to insure banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building-and-loan associations, installment lending companies, and other such financial institutions, which the Administrator finds to be qualified by experience or facilities and approves as eligible for credit insurance, against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit, and purchases of obligations representing loans and advances of credit, made by them on and after April 1, 1936, and prior to April 1, 1937, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available, for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and additions upon improved real property, and the purchase and installation of equipment and machinery upon such real property, by the owners thereof or by lessees of such real property under a lease for a period of not less than 1 year. In no case shall the insurance granted by the Administrator under this section to any such financial institution on the loans, advances of credit, and purchases made by such financial institution for such purposes on and after April 1, 1936, exceed 10 percent of the total amount of such loans, advances of credit, and purchases. The total liability incurred by the Administrator for all insurance heretofore and hereafter granted under this section shall not exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000.

"(b) No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it (1) unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions as the Administrator shall prescribe in order to make credit available for the purposes of this title, and (2) unless the amount of such loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $2,000, except that in the case of any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase made for the purpose of such financing with respect to real property already improved by apartment or multiple-family houses, hotels, office, business, or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, or manufacturing or industrial plants, or improved by some other structure which is to be converted into a structure of any of the types herein enumerated, such insurance may be granted if the amount of the loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $50,000.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator shall have the power, under regulations to be prescribed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to assign or sell at public or private sale, or otherwise dispose of, any evidence of debt, contract, claim, property, or security assigned to or held by him in connection with the payment of insurance heretofore or hereafter granted under this section, and to collect or compromise all obligations assigned to or held by him and all legal or equitable rights accruing to him in connection with the payment of such insurance until such time as such obligations may be referred to the Attorney General for suit or collection."

Sec. 3. Section 3 of title I of the National Housing Act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2 of the National Housing Act, relating to the insurance of loans and advances for improvements upon real property, and for other purposes."

OPERATION OF FOREIGN AND AMERICAN SHIPS IN FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 260, asking for information from the Department of Commerce, has been favorably reported by the committee; and I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] now has no objection to it. However, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] asked that information for 3 more years than the original resolution contained be asked for, and I have requested the information for those years also.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of the resolution yesterday because it had been referred to a committee, and the committee had not reported. Now the report is here, and it is unanimous, so I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state that I was informed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that it was his intention to move to have the resolution recommitment to the committee. I understood from him that the resolution was voted out when he was not there, and that he thought it should be given further consideration by the committee. I do not think the resolution should be taken up in his absence.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to have the Senate take up the resolution in his absence. Does the Senator from Alabama realize that all the resolution does is to ask for information? It has been almost a matter of courtesy of the Senate that if any Senator desired information for the Senate, usually the resolution was acted on the day it was submitted. This resolution has no legislative feature at all.

Mr. BLACK. It is my understanding that the resolution asks for information all of which has been testified to before the committee, and that the resolution would simply bring up to the Senate at this time, when a subsidy bill is about to be considered, a statement from the Secretary of Commerce on matters which it would be proper for witnesses to testify to under oath, when they could be interrogated as to their qualifications, but matters which some believe should not appear in answer to a resolution.

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot see any reason why the opinions and the facts available in a department should not be available to the Senate of the United States. Whether or not the committee has gone into this question is a matter of debate. I venture to say there are many things in the resolution which the committee has not in its report; and if we are going to pass on legislation, certainly all the information we can get ought to be made available.

I have no predilection on the matter. I do not know but that the Senator and I may have a lot in common on it; but I should like to have information on which I may form an opinion. Certainly I can see no harm in a Senator requesting that there be made available to the Senate of the United States information which is in the possession of one of the departments having to do with an important subject.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, I did not rise to object to the consideration of the resolution. I determined yesterday, when I heard it read for the first time, that if the resolution should come up for consideration I should ask for amendments which would require the Department of Commerce to give the authority for each separate statement made as to a matter alleged to be a fact in connection with the subject.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I can point out something to the Senator. The Department of Commerce has a research division. I have not communicated with the Secretary of Commerce, but I have asked if certain information is there. What that information is I have no means of knowing. I have never asked for it; and I should like to get it from the research department so that other Senators and I may read it. The information may be injurious to the proponents or the opponents of the bill; I do not know as to that. All the resolution does is to ask for data which, I understand, the Department can furnish very quickly, and which we ought to have, and which is factual—not matters of opinion, but information which I understand is factual.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I heard the resolution read; and certain information is asked for as a matter of fact about which, in my judgment, it is impossible for the Department of Commerce to have accurate knowledge.

Mr. TYDINGS. Only one; and I have no objection to having that clause stricken out.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think anyone could accurately figure the difference in the cost of production here and abroad and the difference in the cost of operation here and abroad.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the representatives of the Department cannot do that, let them say so. If they think they can, let them say so.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator frankly that I do not know what they would say—whether they would say they could or could not do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know, either.

Mr. BLACK. But the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] told me he intended to move to send the resolution back to the committee, and I was sure the Senator from Maryland did not know it. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be proper to suggest the absence of a quorum before the resolution comes up. It is my understanding that the Senator from Missouri is now at a meeting of the Commerce Committee, and I am sure the Senator from Maryland would not want to have the Senate consider the resolution during his absence.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to take advantage of the Senator's absence. The Senator from Missouri may submit, at any time he wishes, a resolution calling for additional information. Why should I be deprived of getting information which I require, or which other Senators may wish? That would not bar the Senator from Missouri from submitting a resolution at any time he may see fit, calling for the information he may desire to have. Certainly, however, the Senator from Missouri will not take the position that other Senators, who may or may not agree with him, are not entitled to the information they wish to have.

All I am asking for is information. I do not know what the information will be. I have never seen any tables on the subject. I do not know whether the information will be pro, con, or in the middle; but I should like to have it.

Mr. BLACK. I think I can inform the Senator about what it is likely to be, judging from the testimony which has been given before the committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, if the Senator from Alabama already has that information, there can be no harm in reproducing it. What would be the harm in having the information if it is already there?

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator desires to discuss the merits of the matter with me, I shall be glad to enter upon the discussion.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I do not wish to do that.

Mr. BLACK. As I stated in the beginning, I rose because the Senator from Missouri had informed me he intended to move to have the resolution sent back to the committee. He made certain statements to the effect that he was not present in the committee when the resolution came up; and, as I understood him, he said he did not know it was to come up.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to take any advantage of the Senator from Missouri; but so long as the resolution asks only for information, I do not see how I could be taking any advantage of the Senator from Missouri in having it considered.

Certainly a Senator is entitled to information. I could write for the information privately and get it and put it in the RECORD, but I should much rather have the weight of authority thrown around it, so that whatever might be said would be considered more authoritative.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator is going to ask that the resolution come up at this time, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well. I will withdraw my request, then, until I can confer with the Senator from Missouri.

PERSONNEL OF MEMPHIS OFFICE OF HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several days ago I wrote a letter to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, in which I asked for certain information about the regional office at Memphis, Tenn. Mr. Fahey, the chairman of the Board, wrote me a letter, which I received this morning, in which he declined to give the information.

I now submit a resolution, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, directing Mr. Fahey to give the information to the Senate. I also ask that my letter to Mr. Fahey and his reply to me, and my rejoinder, be published immediately after what I have just stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution and letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 268) is as follows:

Whereas the question of regional offices established by the Federal Home Loan Bank in addition to State offices is a question to be dealt with by the Congress; and

Whereas it is desired by the Senate to have information concerning such regional offices for the purpose of proposed legislation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Home Loan Bank Board furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable moment, the number of regional offices, the number of persons employed in each, the names and addresses of the various officials and employees of such offices, when they were appointed, the salary of each, the general duties of such offices, and for what reasons, if any, regional offices were established in States where there are State organizations or set-ups.

The letters are as follows:

MARCH 6, 1936.

HON. JOHN H. FAHEY,

Federal Home Loan Bank Board,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FAHEY: I would be very glad if you will furnish me the list of names of the officers and employees at the regional office at Memphis, giving the post-office addresses of each on the date of their appointment, and the dates of their appointment.

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH McKELLAR.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD,

Washington, March 16, 1936.

Re: Personnel lists—Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR McKELLAR: I am in receipt of your letter of March 6 in which you request a list of names of the officers and employees of the regional office in Memphis, together with other data concerning them.

I regret that I do not see how it is possible for us to supply this list in response to your request. From time to time the Corporation receives from Members of Congress, the press, and others requests for information regarding personnel matters, such as names and salaries of employees in the Washington and field offices, also lists of names of applicants for loans, those to whom loans have been granted, those rejected, and many other similar questions dealing with the details of the operations of this Corporation. Along with this type have come many other requests for information of a statistical nature bearing upon applications received, loans closed, etc.

All such information as is compiled by our statistical department and is available in the Washington office we are, of course, able to supply promptly to Members of Congress. Information which we do not regularly compile and which would have to be prepared at great expense to the Corporation we do not feel we have the authority under the law to prepare or supply. We have felt that it was the plain intent of the law that the money provided for the Corporation was to be used for the benefit of distressed home owners and that we had no right to expend it for the preparation of special information which would not be compiled for the purposes of the Corporation. We do not have personnel records in the form in which you desire them.

The Corporation at present has nearly 20,000 employees, and almost that many attorneys and appraisers on our approved list of appointees. To work up statistics and informative data from among this large number of names would take a long time to copy, the services of many employees, and the expenditure of a very considerable sum of money. There is no reason why the Corporation should compile such lists in the form suggested for its own purposes.

I am sure you will agree that if the Board felt that it had the authority to assign the necessary employees to this special work and approved the expenditure at the request of one Member of Congress, it must do the same thing for any Member who makes a similar request. It certainly has no right to discriminate or a desire to do so.

If, therefore, the Corporation departed from what it believed to be the purpose of the act in connection with one request of this kind, it must do so in all cases. Such a course would involve widespread disturbance of the work of the Corporation, aside from the expense involved. We would, of course, respond as promptly as possible to any congressional resolution calling for information which would not only authorize us to compile it but provide for any additional expenditures which would be made necessary. Information of this nature was published by the Government Printing Office under a Senate resolution which may now be found in pamphlet form, known as Senate Document No. 146, Seventy-third Congress, second session.

Please understand that we are ready at all times to assist you or any other Member of Congress in supplying material which we have already available as to particular and general activities of the Corporation. Our difficulty is when we are presented with requests for material which we do not compile for our own purposes and the preparation of which was not contemplated by the act.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. FAHEY, Chairman.

MARCH 24, 1936.

Hon. JOHN H. FAHEY,

Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FAHEY: Your letter of March 16 has been received. It is an exceedingly surprising communication.

It would not have taken you nearly as long to have furnished me this list of employees at Memphis with their names, salaries, and addresses as it did to write me your extended reply to my letter.

Yours truly,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator ask for immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but at the next meeting of the Senate I should like to have it taken up.

Mr. McNARY. Is the resolution to be referred to a standing committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it merely asks for information, and I imagine there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

STATUE OF ALBERT GALLATIN

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, some years ago Congress passed an act providing for the erection of a statue of Albert Gallatin, former Secretary of the Treasury, at some point to be decided upon by the Fine Arts Commission, the Joint Committee on the Library, and so forth, with a proviso that the authorization should expire within a certain period unless the Albert Gallatin Memorial Association should be able to raise the money to erect the statue. The time elapsed, and they were not able to raise it. They have since raised the required amount.

From the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 215, authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for the Albert Gallatin statue in Washington, D. C., and I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution, in order to carry out the intention of Congress originally enacted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has proposed that we have a call of the calendar on Thursday. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, as well as to several other Senators, that perhaps we should postpone action on their measures until that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well; I will wait.

ORDER FOR RECESS AND CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request in somewhat unusual form.

Because of the prolonged illness of the beloved Chaplain of the Senate, I do not desire to move an adjournment; but it seems to me the Senate should be afforded the opportunity of transacting routine morning business.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its labors today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon of Thursday next; and that when the Senate meets on Thursday it proceed first to the consideration of routine morning business; and when that order shall have been disposed of, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

BUSINESS PROSPERITY UNDER THE NEW DEAL

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a memorandum, which is believed to be accurate, making a comparison for the years 1932, 1934, and 1935 of the deficits and profits of certain recognized and well-known business organizations in this country. This memorandum will be interesting to all Senators, since it discloses very marked improvement in the condition of the business organizations to which it relates.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. By whom was the memorandum prepared?

Mr. ROBINSON. The memorandum was compiled by the Democratic National Committee, and for that reason I can assure the Senator it is authentic and reliable. The figures, however, were taken from the financial report of the business concerns referred to, and from press reports which from time to time have been published. It is merely a compilation of data which have already been published.

Mr. McNARY. It does not bear the stamp of authenticity of any governmental agency? It is just an assembling of facts and figures by a Democratic organization?

Mr. ROBINSON. Compiled largely from Republican press reports. [Laughter.]

I also ask, in the same connection, to have printed in the RECORD three brief articles from the New York Herald Tribune. I do not assume that the Senator from Oregon would require any substantiation of financial reports contained in that great Republican newspaper.

The three articles to which reference is made include one from Mr. Bert Pierce, automobile editor. The article summarizes very clearly and forcefully comparisons which have been made showing the condition of the automobile business generally.

The second article is from another staff correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, Mr. Harvey E. Runner. It relates to industrial affairs generally, the headline being as follows:

Mills, factories, retail trade gird for big business gains. Petree declares spring sales have started in such proportions as to assure 12-percent increase for March and better in April.

The third article is from the Herald Tribune bureau, and from that I have eliminated certain paragraphs which have only remote relation to the subject matter being presented. The headline of this article is—

Retail sales rise despite flood. St. Louis leads with 32-percent gain.

New York stores show 9-percent increase for week; Boston, 14; Philadelphia, 8; and Cleveland expects advance of 10 to 25 for month.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Have these offerings been referred to the Joint Committee on Printing in order to determine the cost?

Mr. ROBINSON. They do not need to be. According to my estimate, they would cover less than two pages, and may be printed in accordance with my request; but if the Senator's anticipations are realized, I shall be glad, when the estimate has been submitted, to renew the request.

Mr. McNARY. I am not at all captious—

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not; the Senator never is.

Mr. McNARY. But there is a rule about matter inserted in the RECORD I have attempted to have enforced in every instance, one I have always respected, and when I respect a rule, I expect others to do likewise.

It occurred to me, from the Senator's reference, that the amount of printed matter he presented was far in excess of the privilege of a Senator to have matter printed without reference to the Committee on Printing. I am willing to accept the estimate of the Senator from Arkansas, and his statement that if the matter shall run over the amount allowed, he will observe the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no intention of doing anything else. I tried to say that to the Senator awhile ago.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator did not say it, if he did try.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will try to do so now to the satisfaction of the Senator.

Let me explain to the Senator that when such requests as this are presented they are referred to the Public Printer, and if his estimate shows that the matter will cover more than two pages of the RECORD the printing is not done except after the approval of the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing and when a second request is submitted.

Now, Mr. President, with that statement I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of the articles to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEADING INDUSTRIAL CORPORATIONS' DEFICITS CONVERTED INTO BIG PROFITS UNDER NEW DEAL

Enough of the leading American industrial corporations had issued their annual reports by the middle of March to show that the enormous gains in net earnings during 1935 over 1934 indicated by the first few reports have applied to all lines of manufacturing and trade. Of 32 major corporations in 13 industrial classifications, only 2 showed deficits in 1935, 1 of which reduced its 1932 deficit of $1,668,287 to $1,083,197 in 1934 and to only $95,387 in 1935; the other from $7,910,149 in 1932 to $3,670,672 in 1934 and to $398,716 in 1935.

Of the 32 reporting corporations, 22 reported deficits in 1932 and 7 in 1934, 2 in 1935. The total profits of the 10 that remained out of the red in 1932 was $38,389,107, of which $26,234,779 in net profits was reported by E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. The net earnings reported by the same 10 corporations in 1935 reached the substantial total of $887,523,643, of which $62,085,410 was reported as clear profit by the great Du Pont parent company. The largest earnings of any one company in 1935 were reported by the General Motors Corporation, of which the Du Ponts are heavy stockholders, amounting to one hundred and sixty-seven millions as compared with only one hundred and sixty-five thousand in 1932.

The statements issued by the 32 corporations for the years 1932, 1934, and 1935 were as follows:

MILLS, FACTORIES, RETAIL TRADE GIRD FOR BIG BUSINESS GAINS—PETREE DECLARES SPRING SALES HAVE STARTED IN SUCH PROPORTIONS AS TO ASSURE 12 PERCENT INCREASE FOR MARCH AND BETTER IN APRIL

By Harvey E. Runner

With mills and factories working at top speed and with retail trade showing steady improvement, manufacturers and merchants are looking forward to the best Easter season in several years, according to views of industrial and merchandising leaders given yesterday to the New York Herald Tribune. Optimism is general throughout the country for a substantial increase in spring business, the only exceptions being in the flood areas, where conditions are at present disorganized and views decidedly conflicting.

March, virtually all factors agree, is proving an exceptionally good business month. Manufacturing industries report orders well above a year ago, with some markets, like the women's coat and suit industry, virtually sold through to Easter, and many mills, especially those dealing in wool goods, being compelled to withdraw some fabric lines, due to oversold conditions.

The retail trade is enjoying the effects of spring buying much earlier this year. Warmer weather following an unusually severe winter seemed all that was necessary to make the consumer think of new clothes.

STORE SALES UP

Even New York City, which a year ago had a poor spring season, is reporting much improved business. Department store sales in the first half of the month showed an increase of 10.6 percent in New York and Brooklyn and a gain of 11.1 percent in the metropolitan area.

Neil Petree, president of the Retail Dry Goods Association of New York and also president of James McCreery & Co., said yesterday that spring business had started in earnest, and that merchants in the city were hopeful of at least a 12-percent gain for March and that up to the middle of April the improvement should continue at the rate of between 10 and 12 percent.

Apparel departments, according to store executives, are already busier than usual at this time of the year, and merchandise is moving faster than it did a year ago. One leading department store said that its women's coat and suit business in March was better than a year ago by 25 percent, that men's clothing was moving more than 30 percent better, and that children's wear was enjoying a 50-percent gain.

The quickened pulse of consumer buying, which got under way late in February, was almost immediately felt in manufacturing and wholesale markets. Store stocks generally have been very low, so that any market pick-up in sales at retail was soon bound to be reflected in manufacturing centers.

GAY COLORS PREDOMINATE

New and gay colors in apparel, much brighter than those of the last several years, have helped to develop interest in spring merchandise. All indications, both merchants and manufacturers agreed, point to the 1936 Easter parade being the most colorful in some time.

Manufacturers who went into new colors and high shades were generally reported to be doing a better business than those who held to more conservative colors. This was particularly true in the handbag trade.

A. Mittenthal, director of the national authority for the ladies' handbag industry, in reporting that business generally was very good, said that those producers who had gone in for high colors had booked orders for spring approximately 25 percent larger than they had a year ago. The increase in business, with manufacturers making up regular lines, amounted to about 10 percent, he said.

The demand for color has been so great and varied so extensively as to shade that handbag producers, he said, have had difficulty in making up the merchandise as rapidly as it was wanted by merchants.

COLOR IN COATS

New spring coats will also be more colorful, according to Samuel Klein, executive director of the Industrial Council of Cloak, Suit, and Skirt Manufacturers, Inc., who said that whereas a year ago only about 20 percent of the dressy coats were in the bright shades, this spring at least 40 percent would be in gayer colors.

In sport coats colors, he said, will indeed become riotous, with gay plaids and Indian-blanket effects much in vogue.

The coat industry, which is working at full speed, is enjoying its best spring season in 6 years, Mr. Klein said. Orders have piled up on the books, materials are hard to get, with woolen yardage fairly well cleaned out at the mills, and as a result deliveries to stores are proving the big problem.

One indication of the high pressure of activity in the coat and suit industry was seen in the announcement that in a single day last week New York City manufacturers called for 151,000 of the labels provided by the Coat and Suit Industry Recovery Board. This was a new high record for any one day.

The Merchants' Ladies' Garment Association, in a bulletin to members yesterday, said the market "apparently was sold up through Easter."

"No new orders can be taken with promise of delivery before Easter, because production is now at its maximum peak," the bulletin warned.

The dress trade is also doing well, according to Samuel Zahn, president of the International Dress Co. and chairman of the Dress Creators League of America, who said that members of his organization were enjoying a 15 to 25 percent gain in pre-Easter business. He reported that prints were in the forefront of the fabric picture, with light brown tones leading the color parade.

BETTER DRESSES IN DEMAND

Morris Kolchin, executive director of the Affiliated Dress Manufacturers, Inc., also told of the improvement in the dress industry, holding, however, that much of the demand was being concentrated on the better type goods. The market is decidedly active, he said, with retailers placing emphasis on higher priced goods.

Louis Rubin, executive director of the Popular Priced Dress Manufacturers Group, Inc., said that the planned production of 6,000,000 dresses in March by the 300 members of his group had been reduced by 1,000,000 dresses because of the floods, but that he was hopeful that the production would be more than made up in April.

The planned production of 6,750,000 dresses selling up $4.75 wholesale in April will most likely be exceeded by more than 1,000,000 garments, he believed. He foresaw an increased demand for goods next month from the now stricken flood areas, which would boost production considerably.

Ward Melville, president of the National Council of Shoe Retailers, Inc., felt that the rapidity with which the sections now suffering from floods get back to normal will have an important bearing on Easter shoe sales. Mr. Melville, who is also head of the Melville Shoe Corporation, the operating company for the Thom McAn and John Ward stores, believed, though, that in the nonflood areas sales of shoes should beat last year's Easter business by from 12 to 15 percent.

SHOE—VOLUME GAINS

In shoe manufacturing circles it was estimated that February production, which was for spring and Easter selling, would exceed the volume of a year ago. While the actual figures have not been announced as yet, manufacturers were of the opinion that they would better January's total of 32,000,000 pairs and go ahead of February a year ago by 5 or 6 percent.

Max H. Zuckerman, executive secretary of the United Infants' and Children's Wear Association, said that manufacturing activity was much greater than a year ago in the industries which his association serves. Business booked for spring and Easter on children's cotton dresses was up by 10 percent, he said, and on silk dresses by a like amount.

In children's coats, he estimated orders at about 15 percent greater, with a distinct demand for better goods, which, he said, were hard to obtain at the present time. Headwear and knit-wear production, he added, were about on a par with last spring.

On children's underwear, however, manufacturing activity, he said, was between 20 and 40 percent greater. On boys' wear the increase was about 10 percent.

FIFTEEN-PERCENT RISE IN SPRING MOTOR SALES OVER LAST YEAR IS FORECAST BY MANUFACTURERS IN DETROIT—ALL REPORT LARGE INCREASES FOR MARCH, WITH PRODUCTION STEPPED UP, USED-CAR STOCKS MOVING—TRUCKS SHARE RISING DEMAND WITH PASSENGER CARS—INDUSTRY'S LEADERS SEE SUMMER GAINS

By Bert Pierce, automobile editor

DETROIT, March 21.—Out of the chill mists marking the departure of a hard winter there has emerged a mighty volume of spring buying that indicates a new record in motor-vehicle sales. From all sections of the country are demands for new cars, with the Middle West and eastern sections leading in calls for immediate deliveries. Automotive manufacturers throughout this area, including Dearborn, Pontiac, Flint, and Lansing, have increased production, and it is expected that capacity output will be under way before April 1.

The upswing of motor-vehicle purchases is widespread in range, with products in all price brackets sharing the attention of a public eager to travel in 1936 models. General business has joined in the clamor for new units, with sheafs of orders for trucks and commercial carriers, while farmers are calling for transportation units needed in agriculture.

BUYERS SEND SALES ROARING

Although there was a temporary lull in automotive sales during January and February, attributed to adverse weather conditions, when heavy snows in some sections of the country sealed routes to showrooms and customers, the inrush of buyers has sent the total of gains soaring. Forecasts, based upon present increases, assert that the spring volume will be at least 15 percent greater than last year and may exceed the output of a similar period in 1929, which is used as a standard yardstick in measuring output achievement.

In a survey of trade inventories the manufacturers show that the usual accumulation of used cars, common to winter, is melting away like the snows of that season. A heavy demand for these vehicles has developed within the last few weeks, and there is a belief that the stocks will be lower than the normal average before the end of May.

Views of some of the automotive leaders on plans and expectations follow:

BUICK BOOSTS PRODUCTION

A second boost in Buick's March production schedule was cited by Harlow H. Curtice, president, Buick Motor Co., as an example of the spring business strides being made. The output for the month is expected to exceed 14,000 units. The production schedules now equal those of last fall, when the new models were announced.

"The velocity of the upturn this spring as compared with previous years of Buick history is significant," said Mr. Curtice. "While a great many circumstances enter into the picture, including general business conditions and selling influences, such as adverse weather and other factors, it is noteworthy that Buick's gain this year was more than 89 percent, as against a best previous gain of 48 percent for the like period in 1926."

"The increase in sales for the period ended March 10 of 1,531 units over the first 10 days of February compared with an average for the last 10 years of 733 cars. Thus both on relative gains and actual deliveries Buick is experiencing the most pronounced spring upturn in its history."

Employment will be maintained at the high current levels of approximately 14,000 workers as the result of the increased activity. While there has been but little fluctuation from this figure throughout the winter months, Mr. Curtice said that this same force will be placed on increased working schedules during March with a corresponding gain in total pay rolls. The manufacturing divisions of the company are operating 5 days a week with two and three shifts in some departments. Domestic retail deliveries for the first 10 days of the month were the largest retail volume for this period since 1928.

CHEVROLET SEES RECORD SPRING

That the policy emphasized by W. E. Holler, vice president and general manager of Chevrolet Motor Co., "Never forget a customer: never let him forget you", is bringing huge returns to the organization is proved by the record volume of spring business.

Chevrolet expectations, based on output for the first 3 weeks of March, are that deliveries will exceed those of any similar month in the history of the company.

"There has been such an increase in demands for our products that we are facing a car shortage at the present time," said Mr. Holler. Chevrolet production has been stepped up from 100,000 to 115,000 units a month in an effort to meet the demands of dealers in all of our nine regions from coast to coast. Orders are rolling in from all sides, in excess of our most optimistic estimates."

With the advent of 1936 the Chevrolet Co. set the yearly sales quota at more than 1,000,000. Reports received to March 10 showed that 530,000 cars and trucks have been built for the domestic and foreign markets. January established a record in sales for any January since the company began the manufacture of vehicles. Despite the bad weather, February was the best in 7 years.

CADILLAC SALES SPURT

Marked gains in sales for cars in the higher priced brackets were revealed by Don E. Ahrens, general sales manager of Cadillac Motor Car Co. He declared some of the biggest increases were registered in several of the more important eastern centers.

"In New York, Boston, and Albany, to select a few cities at random, our sales during January and February of this year reveal an average increase of 101 percent over the retail deliveries made at these points in the first 2 months of 1935."

"Our increased sales, both in the East and throughout the entire United States, appear particularly significant because they were achieved despite two adverse factors, either of which might have been expected to exert a strongly retarding influence," Mr. Ahrens continued. "One was the fact that our 1936 cars were introduced early in October 1935, and thus by the first of the year they had been on the market for nearly 3 months. Doubtless a great many fine car buyers who had been waiting for the 1936 models made their purchases during this 3-month period prior to January 1."

"The other factor was the unusually severe weather, which until recently made prospective buyers reluctant to accept demonstrations."

DODGE WIDENS MARKETS

With orders pouring in and reports from abroad emphasizing the good acceptance of Dodge and other Chrysler products, there is definite assurance that business is on the upswing, according to K. T. Keller, president of Chrysler Corporation and president of the Dodge division of Chrysler. That the spring buying will continue above average is indicated by the steady increase in the demand for cars and trucks, he believes.

"Our weekly reports, received from all over the country and which serve as guides in our production schedules, have shown a rising trend that would indicate there is a solid volume of business pressing forward. There seems to be no doubt that it will carry onward into the summer," he said. "I believe the buying means that there is substantial gain in general business."

An increased value is being placed on style, providing economy of operation is not sacrificed for appearances, according to L. G. Peed, vice president of the De Soto division, Chrysler Corporation.

"Spring buying has commenced earlier than usual. Our sales executives, who returned last week from a Nation-wide tour of De Soto dealers, report a brisk public response to the new models. A large part of the public is reacting to the recent severe winter by purchasing new cars and taking to the road once more."

FORD RURAL SALES INCREASE

That the volume of automotive business this spring will equal, if not exceed, that of last year's season was the belief of Edsel B. Ford, president, Ford Motor Co. Increases in sales which have been blocked by the snow and ice of January and February already are apparent. The upswing in demand has affected both Ford and Lincoln car outputs that have been stepped up to meet the growing call for vehicles throughout the country. This is particularly true of the rural districts, where the winter severity had placed a blight on deliveries, according to Mr. Ford.

"There has been a steady growth over a period of years in the sales of our products in the agricultural regions, and we in turn are attempting to extend the uses of farm products," said Mr. Ford. "We feel that through the research department of the Ford Motor Co. the farmer has been drawn nearer to market, not only by transportation furnished, but new utility discovered for materials which hitherto were regarded as of little or no value. We shall continue in this line of endeavor, and I think that the benefits shared by the farmers in the future will be even greater than those of the past."

HUDSON VALUE RISES

"While early spring buying might be attributed to the handicap placed by heavy snows in February, I feel confident that the real reasons are that there is a definite influx of purchases due to the eagerness of the public to obtain new vehicles and an increase in general business," said A. Edward Barit, president, Hudson Motor Car Co. "Our factory sales now are at a higher point than at any time in 1935. There has been a steady gain in volume during the last 3 weeks.

"This spring season forms the first unbiased test of the motorist's desire to own a new vehicle when compared with any similar period in many years. Previously there was reflection of the new models offered at the shows, which began in January, to accelerate the activities of prospective customers. That influence has been dimmed by the passage of time, as the public viewed these products in November, 2 months earlier than usual. So it seems fair to assume that the inrush of automotive business is the result of a widespread urge rather than a stimulated effort. Furthermore, there are indications that the steady tide of buying will increase."

Mr. Barit pointed out that there are four times as many new Hudson and Terraplane cars on the streets and highways than there were a year ago comparing day for day. Then he presented records which showed that the company had built up the strongest selling organization in many years.

RETAIL SALES RISE DESPITE FLOOD; ST. LOUIS LEADS WITH 32-PERCENT GAIN—NEW YORK STORES SHOW 9-PERCENT INCREASE FOR WEEK, BOSTON 14, PHILADELPHIA 8, AND CLEVELAND EXPECTS ADVANCE OF 10 TO 25 FOR MONTH

WASHINGTON, March 21.—Practically all divisions of trade and industry were seriously disorganized throughout large areas of the East as the result of the floods, the Department of Commerce said today in its report on business conditions in 32 cities. During much of the week both retail and wholesale activities were brought to a virtual standstill in the Pittsburgh area as well as in large sections of Maryland, Virginia, New England, and some other parts of the East.

With plants inundated, industrial production, too, was greatly curtailed during the week.

The vigor of seasonal influences, however, accelerated the upward trend of retail buying in substantially all regions of the country that escaped the devastating floods. Spring weather and Easter buying both became a stimulating factor.

New York reported a continuation of the gains of recent weeks with department-store sales running 9 percent ahead of last year. Philadelphia reported steady expansion with department-store sales 8.1 percent higher than last year. Retail sales in Boston advanced 14 percent over the 1935 week. Cleveland department-store sales felt the effect of early Easter buying, and gains for the month were expected to run from 10 to 25 percent ahead of last year. St. Louis department stores reported a gain of 32 percent over last year.

All business in Pittsburgh was practically at a standstill due to flood conditions and the inundation of most of the business section. For the week ended March 14, however, department-store sales were 17.2 percent higher than the same period last year, and for the 4 weeks' period ended on that date the gain was 23.8 percent.

Chicago reported constant improvement in retail trade with pre-Easter sales of apparel reaching normal strides and retail sales running 12 percent to 15 percent ahead of last year. Sharper gains over 1935 were reported by west-coast cities, also Wilmington, Houston, Memphis, Atlanta, Charleston, Louisville, and Minneapolis. Kansas City reported a new high in volume for several years.

Reports from the 12 Federal Reserve cities follow:

Boston: Retail sales advanced about 14 percent in value over the same week a year ago. Accumulation of surface water, augmented by rainfall, resulted in floods throughout New England which caused heavy property damage, disrupted transportation by railroad and motor, and necessitated closing, for 2 or 3 days, a number of industrial establishments alongside rivers, particularly in the Merrimack and Connecticut Valleys. Even in some larger cities surface-water flooding caused considerable damage and retarded automotive and pedestrian movement.

Trading in cotton goods moderate and a little scattered. Prices of raw cotton were fairly steady, and this stability in face of Government holdings of spot cotton was considered a hopeful sign. Sales of raw domestic wool have been very light, with volume insufficient to establish prices, although quotations remained unchanged. More favorable weather has stimulated retail sales of footwear, and this, combined with the stronger hide market, has improved sentiment appreciably. Buying interest has broadened and new business is reported slightly larger.

Demand for leather has shown irregular improvement, with inquiries broader and strength in hides giving leather prices firmer tone. Hide markets last week were very active and turnover exceeded 200,000 hides. Demand from tanners and traders for native cows was keen at 10½ cents, and strength in this selection helped establish a firmer price for steers.

New York: Continuation of gains over a wide range marked trade in the metropolitan district during the week. Despite some bad spells of weather, department stores, with few exceptions, outstripped 1935 results. Dollar sales were 9 percent ahead of the same week last year. Home furnishings again in wide demand, although furniture was disappointing. Apparel was good, and most ready-to-wear accessories did very well. Shoes, however, were only fair.

Wholesale centers were active. Resident buying offices reported a steady flow of reorders from other parts of the country. Dresses, coats, and suits in strong demand, with local manufacturers finding the press of orders beyond expectations. Buying that was held back in February is now coming on the market. Millinery demand exceptionally heavy, with manufacturers delayed on delivery and prices stronger.

Philadelphia: Business activity continued its steady expansion. Compared with previous week, gains were registered by all major indices except real-estate transactions. New construction, stimulated by the advent of mild weather, made the best showing. Retail trade continues to improve, with department-store sales 8.1 percent better than last year.

Cleveland: Stimulated by Easter purchasing, department-store sales for the first week in March ran 16 percent ahead of the same period last year. Retail trade in northern Ohio continued to run ahead of the national average, and merchants were heavily stocked for the anticipated rush. Steel operations moved past the 1935 peak, with the Cleveland rate advancing 11 points to 75 percent, attributed to larger orders from the automobile industry. More than 160,000 people attended the General Motors show and bought $1,000,000 worth of automobiles and electric refrigerators during the 8 days.

Richmond: Business in the fifth reserve district showed symptoms of healthy momentum, with bank debits at Richmond rising to the highest point in several weeks. The $30,992,000 compared with $23,942,000 last week and $29,609,000 in the same week last year. Trade reacted favorably to the advance of the spring season and the attendant Easter buying tendency.

Atlanta: Retail sales moved forward for a gain of 8 percent over last week and 10 percent over the comparable 1935 period. The rise spread to wholesale with dry goods, hardware, and groceries moving to higher levels than last year.

Chicago: Retail trade marked by constant improvement, with sales running from 12 to 15 percent ahead of the same period last year. Not only were pre-Easter sales of apparel reaching normal strides but house furnishings of all kinds were producing good sales volume. Wholesalers reported an increase of purchases, long delayed by February cold spell. Steel-ingot output in the Chicago district during last week increased 0.5 to 63.5 percent of capacity, compared with advance of 4 points to 61 percent of capacity for entire United States. Illinois soft-coal production for February was reported at 5,441,982 tons, an increase of 1,099,709 tons over February and highest production of any February since 1930.

St. Louis: Department stores reported very successful sales week, with 32 percent gain over same week last year. Continued improvement in wholesale lines.

Minneapolis: Twenty retail stores showed 20 to 30 percent increase over similar period last month and average of 20 percent over similar period last year. Similar conditions shown in country stores. Activity reflected in wholesale lines. Flour sales, 52 percent; actual production, 47 percent. Reported twice as many farms selling as in similar period last year at fair prices.

Kansas City: Retail trade during week reached new seasonal high for several years; ready-to-wear lines reporting business 35 percent ahead of a year ago. Department stores, furniture, and other lines were held to 15 percent above this time last year. Wholesale trade likewise experienced a broad expansion, due to additional spring demands.

Dallas: Retail trade failed to maintain the pace of the previous week, but in a majority of cases the gain over last year was well sustained, the average rise being 24.4 percent. Refrigerator distributors reported sales of past month 35.6 percent greater than last year.

San Francisco: Retail trade continued on the upgrade and substantially ahead of last year. Spring buying was reflected more impressively in wholesale trade, which was considerably more active than last week.

FORESTRY FIRE PROTECTION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration I submitted an amendment very materially increasing the amount made available under the report of the committee for forestry fire protection. The amendment that was offered contemplated an increase in the amount carried in the bill as it passed the House from $1,578,632 to $2,500,000, which is the authorization of the act commonly known as the McNary-Clarke Act.

The subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations having charge of the agricultural appropriation bill made an effort to reduce the aggregate amount carried in the bill and to keep down the appropriations. Notwithstanding those efforts, as a result of the action of the committee and the action by the Senate over the recommendations of the committee, there has been an increase in the amount carried by approximately $38,000,000 when compared with the amount carried in the bill as it passed the House.

The Senate committee modified the amendment which I offered and raised the appropriation for forestry fire protection $152,750, which was in accordance with the Budget estimate. For some reason which I have not been able to understand the committee and the House reduced the appropriation for forestry fire protection below the Budget estimate. The Senate committee saw fit to increase the appropriation carried in the bill, as I have already stated, to the amount estimated for by the Budget.

While this increase will not be sufficient to afford fire protection to all the forest areas which require it, it will be helpful in accomplishing the very laudable purpose of protecting the forest resources of the United States, of the States, and of private organizations and citizens from waste and destruction by fire.

The total area of State and privately owned forest lands approximates 426,000,000 acres. Of this area, 237,000,000 acres now have some form of organized protection under the control of State forestry departments. Thus an area of approximately 189,000,000 acres of forest land is lacking in protection; and the statistics show that one-third of this area—more than 60,000,000 acres—is burned over every year, as compared with 1 percent of the area within the protected forests.

There are other figures which I think of sufficient importance to bring before the Senate.

During the fiscal year 1936 the Federal appropriation for forest-fire protection was $1,578,632. The State and private fund available was $4,800,024. The amendment I offered would have brought to the maximum authorized by law appropriations for this very laudable purpose.

Mr. President, I neglected to state, and wish to add, that it was my conclusion that I would not be justified in urging at this time the increase to the full amount carried in the amendment referred to, although I believe every dollar of it could be used in a very helpful and advantageous way in the conservation of resources which are of the greatest value to this and the coming generations.

SALARIES AND POSITIONS OF CERTAIN SENATE EMPLOYEES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as myself, I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which Senate Resolutions 249, 252, and 253 were agreed to yesterday.

Briefly speaking, these resolutions direct the Committee on Appropriations to increase certain salaries of the personnel of the Senate. The resolutions were agreed to without any reference to the committee; and, therefore, when the committee studies the appropriation bill, it finds that some of the recommendations are worthy and ought to be incorporated in the bill, but some of them would accentuate the difference in the pay scale between comparable employees. Therefore we should like to have the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to reconsidered, and the resolutions referred to the committee, so that equity may be done all the employees of the Senate.

It is unusual for the Senate virtually to appropriate money without any consideration by any committee; and because, in some cases, we cannot carry out the will of the Senate without doing greater injustices than those sought to be corrected, I enter a motion for reconsideration of the votes by which the three Senate resolutions were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURKE in the chair). The motion will be entered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I make no objection to the action taken by the Senator from Maryland; but I point out the fact that under a new rule adopted by the body at the other end of the Capitol it is impossible—it will be, to say the least, impracticable—for the Senate to have considered any increase in the number of its employees or agencies, or any increase in their compensation, unless and until the Senate shall have considered and acted upon resolutions authorizing such increases.

I have no objection, of course, to the Committee on Appropriations considering the resolutions. The Senator from Illinois offered two of the resolutions, and I do not understand that the Senator from Maryland expects to have any action taken on his motion in the absence of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that what he has said is correct; and it is not the intention of the Appropriations Committee to disregard the resolutions. We should like to consider them and report them back so that the Senate may then agree to them if it cares to do so, and we may make the increases where they are wise; but unless some committee considers the resolutions before they are agreed to by the Senate it can readily be seen that greater injustices may occur than those we now may have.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTERS IN ARKANSAS

Mr. McKELLAR. I also report favorably from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the nominations of two postmasters in Arkansas. Because there has been a delay in this matter, I ask unanimous consent that these two nominations may be immediately considered and confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the nominations.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James F. Rieves to be postmaster at Marion, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gladys L. Hobgood to be postmaster at Monette, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the two nominations of postmasters in Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Arthur D. Fairbanks to be United States marshal, district of Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS TO THURSDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate carry out the order previously made and take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until Thursday, March 26, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

*Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 24
(legislative day of Feb. 24), 1936*

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, we thank Thee for the sunlight which has arisen and poured its abundance over the wide earth. Inspire us, we beseech Thee, by the passionate love of the truth; help us to make every sacrifice to follow it in all its ways. In the familiar circle of life and duty may we be found using the gifts of wise judgment and honest discrimination. Do Thou protect our country from every form of violence, rebellion, and corruption. We pray that all those in authority and all magistrates may be upright in the administration of justice. Heavenly Father, preserve the strength and health of our President; graciously regard our Speaker and the Congress and grant that our eternal refreshment and joy may be at the river of life, bright as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11035. An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman withhold his request until I can propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I withhold my request.

THE WORK OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech made by the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Chairman Charles H. March, of the Federal Trade Commission, at the eleventh annual dinner of the Drug, Chemical, and Allied Trades Section of the New York Board of Trade, Inc., at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City on the evening of Thursday, March 19, 1936:

Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen, I am very happy to be your guest at this large and representative annual gathering of your industry, and to have this opportunity to talk to you about the work of the Federal Trade Commission.

A little more than a year ago it was my privilege to preside over a trade-practice conference for the wholesale drug industry held in Chicago. I had the pleasure of meeting many of you at that time. You who were there should be proud that that proved one of the most successful trade-practice conferences ever sponsored by our Commission. Also, you will be gratified to know that the trade-practice rules adopted at that conference have been lived up to by your industry with such unanimity that very few violations have been reported to the Commission. What has been done in the wholesale drug industry through the trade-practice conference procedure has been or is being done in a great many other industries. This cooperative effort on the part of business to put its own house in order is an inspiring thing.

One of the reasons assigned for inviting me to speak to you tonight is that the work of the Federal Trade Commission is not as generally known and understood as it should be. Unfortunately, that is true. But it is not as true as it used to be. One reason for the increasing public knowledge of the work of the Commission is the trade-practice conference procedure, and the spread of the idea of cooperative effort on the part of business. One reason why the work of the Federal Trade Commission has not been as widely known to the public is that it is seldom of a spectacular character. It is nonetheless important, valuable, and effective. The more that is known of the Commission's work and the better it is understood, the more it will be appreciated.

HISTORY AND PURPOSES OF THE ACT

The Federal Trade Commission is an administrative agency, exercising quasi-judicial functions. It is next to the oldest independent agency of the Federal Government. The Federal Trade Commission Act was signed by President Wilson on September 26, 1914. In a public statement issued at that time, President Wilson said that in the Commission's establishment there had been created—

"A means of inquiry and of accommodation in the field of commerce which ought to both coordinate the enterprises of our traders and manufacturers and to remove the barriers of misunderstanding and of a too technical interpretation of the law."

He added that the Commission had been created with "powers of guidance and accommodation which have relieved businessmen of unfounded fears and set them upon the road of helpful and confident enterprise."

While the Commission has certain other powers and duties, its principal functions are twofold:

1. To prevent unfair methods of competition in commerce.
2. To make investigations at the direction of the President, the Congress, upon the request of the Attorney General, or upon its own initiative.

You are more interested in the first of these functions, and I shall, therefore, pass over the second, that is, the investigational work of the Commission, with only a brief reference. However, let me say that it would be difficult to understate the importance of the investigational work which the Commission has done and is doing, or exaggerate its value to the American public. During its life, the Commission has conducted more than 80 general investigations and fact-finding studies. Notable among these have been the food inquiry, which resulted in the passage of the Packers and Stockyards Act; the chain-store inquiry; investigations of the steel and textile industries, and of electric and gas utilities, to mention only a few of the more important. These inquiries have resulted in wholesome legislation, and in reforms which business and industry themselves have adopted, due to the publicity attendant upon the Commission's investigations and reports. In many instances, they have resulted in savings to the public amounting in the aggregate to hundreds of millions of dollars. Merely the publicity attendant upon these investigations has been a powerful corrective of abuses which had become prevalent among the industries investigated.

Legislation resulting directly or indirectly from these inquiries has included the Packers and Stockyards Act, the truth-in-securities law, and the act for the regulation of stock exchanges, to mention only a few.

But you businessmen are more interested in the work of the Commission in the prevention of unfair trade practices than in its investigational functions.

Matters coming before the Commission directly probably affect the interests of more people than those referred to any other Federal agency. Sometimes a single case directly affects millions of citizens. Some affect practically every household. They have to do with nearly everything we eat, drink, wear, or make use of in any way.

The objective of the Commission is protection of honest competitors and the consuming public from fraudulent and misleading practices in commerce. In so many words, the Commission's organic act directs it to prevent those subject to the act "from using unfair methods of competition in commerce."

Procedure before the Commission is simple and effective. A case may originate in any one of several ways. The most common origin is through complaint of an unfair trade practice made by a competitor or a consumer. No formality is required for anyone to bring a matter to the Commission's attention. A letter setting forth the facts is sufficient, or it may be done by a personal call. In no case is the identity of the complainant made public.

When a matter is brought to the Commission's attention, it orders an investigation. If from the facts it appears that the law is being violated, the Commission orders a complaint served upon the alleged offender, who is thereafter known as the respondent. He is allowed a reasonable time in which to make answer, after which the case is ordered to trial. Hearings are held, briefs filed, and the case argued before the Commission, which then takes the matter under advisement and renders its decision as in the usual court proceeding.

If the Commission finds that the facts bear out the allegations of the complaint, it issues an order requiring the respondent to cease and desist from the unlawful practices set out in the findings. The respondent has the right of appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and finally to the United States Supreme Court.

If the Commission finds that one of its orders is being violated, it presents the facts to the court of appeals in the appropriate circuit and asks that its order be enforced. Its cases are given priority in those courts. If the court finds that the order is valid, and is being violated, it requires the respondent to obey the cease-and-desist order. In case of violation of the court's order, the matter may be then handled by the court as in a contempt proceeding; that is, a penalty may be imposed.

We have developed another procedure, more informal, known as the stipulation procedure, by which we have been able to expedite our work and save a great deal of expense.

It frequently happens that a violation occurs through ignorance, and that the attention of the offender has only to be called to the fact to induce him to stop. Instead of issuing a formal complaint the Commission allows the individual or corporation complained against an opportunity to sign a stipulation to cease and desist from the practices charged. If he does so, further action is suspended; if he refuses, the case goes to trial.

The Commission believes this procedure protects the American consumer from numerous unfair methods of competition, and, by reason of its simplicity and economy, reaches a far larger number of abuses than would otherwise be possible. Also, this procedure saves large sums, both to the Government and to respondents. It should be said, however, that whether a respondent shall be permitted to sign a stipulation is entirely within the discretion of the Commission. This privilege is never permitted where violations are especially malicious and to the serious injury of the public.

Some may ask just what are unfair methods of competition in commerce, within the meaning of the Commission's act. Congress wisely did not attempt to define the term, because unfair competition may take any one of a thousand forms. On this point the Supreme Court said: "In the nature of things, it was impossible to describe and define in advance just what constituted unfair competition, and in the final analysis it became a question of law, after the facts were ascertained." Therefore, each case must be considered in the light of the facts pertinent thereto.

In general unfair trade practices may be grouped into two classes: Those which involve an element of fraud or dishonesty, and those not inherently dishonest but which are restrictive of fair competition. It is the job of the Commission, therefore, when a complaint comes to its attention, to ascertain the facts and render its judgment on those facts. Conclusive evidence that the Commission's work is thorough is to be found in the record of its cases appealed to the courts. For example, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, Commission orders were approved in all of the 10 cases taken to circuit court of appeals. From February 1935 to February of this year 19 Commission orders were appealed to circuit courts of appeals, and in none was the Commission overruled.

Cases decided by the Commission affect every competitor in the business engaged in by the respondents, as well as consumers of the commodities involved. When you eliminate an unfair practice by one competitor, every honest competitor is benefited thereby, as well as all consumers of the products involved. What this is worth to the public it is not possible to estimate, but the amount would be large.

As appreciation of the value of its work grows, more businessmen and consumers are turning to the Commission for relief from dishonest practices. This is evidenced by the recent heavy increase in the Commission's legal work. In the last 2 years this increase has been very marked. During the fiscal year 1934 there were 1,829 cases before the Commission, whereas for the fiscal year 1935 the number increased to 3,385. From the number of cases coming to the Commission thus far this year, it is estimated the total number to come to its attention during the year will be in excess of 4,500.

TRADE-PRACTICE CONFERENCES

In its work of suppressing unfair methods of competition in commerce the Commission has developed a plan whereby it is possible to accomplish this objective by wholesale, at great saving both to the Government and to business. I refer to the Commission's trade-practice conference procedure. This procedure is a logical development of the Commission's effort, in cooperation with business, to protect the public from unscrupulous men who are out to exploit the public and increase their profits at no matter what cost to honest competitors and the public.

This procedure, about which you are likely to hear much more, affords an opportunity for members of a particular business to sit down together and, under the sponsorship of the Commission, consider their particular problems, and collectively agree to the abandonment of unfair practices. Under this procedure, members of a business take the initiative in establishing a degree of self-government by setting up their own code of business ethics, subject, of course, to the approval of the Commission. This means that they must be within the law. Thus all members of a given business are placed on the same fair competitive basis. When unfair practices in an industry are thus eliminated, every honest member of that industry is benefited, and it is made easier to require unscrupulous persons to keep within the law. The consuming public is also a direct beneficiary. That is where the primary concern of the Federal Trade Commission lies, for it is the public interest with which the Commission must at all times concern itself.

By this procedure often the unfair and dishonest practices of an entire industry are corrected at a single conference, whereas if it were necessary to take action against each individual offender, hundreds of proceedings might have to be instituted.

The Commission's trade-practice conference procedure usually leads to the prompt abandonment of unfair practices by the entire industry concerned. Moreover, an industry thus grows into the habit of policing itself, and its honest members, who constitute the large majority, cooperate in bringing about enforcement of the law.

Since inauguration of the Commission's trade-practice procedure approximately 175 conferences have been held. It is gratifying to report that agreements so arrived at have been observed by an overwhelming majority of the members of the industries concerned.

Applications from more than 40 industries for such conferences are now pending. Some are from very large and important industries. In addition, representatives of approximately 200 other industries have made inquiry as to necessary steps for holding conferences. It would be difficult to overemphasize the importance of this growth of cooperative spirit in business.

AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT

I have discussed briefly the origin and history of the Commission. Now a word about certain proposed amendments to the organic act under which the Commission functions. Most of these amendments were recommended by the Commission in its last annual report, in the light of its 21 years of experience under its act. These amendments were introduced in the Senate by Senator WHEELER, of Montana, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which has favorably reported the amendments to the Senate, and in the House by Representative RAYBURN, of Texas, chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I refer to these amendments because considerable misinformation exists about them. No doubt some of it has been circulated by interests unfriendly to the purposes of the amendments and possibly to the original act. The principal amendment proposed is to section 5 of the Commission's act, which would insert therein the words "and unfair or deceptive acts and practices", so that the language of that section, as amended, would read: "That unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts and practices in commerce are hereby declared unlawful."

Without this amendment, there is question whether the Commission has jurisdiction of an unfair practice where it develops that the offender has a monopoly in his field and, therefore, has no competitor, or in a case where all competitors are equally guilty of the same practice. In one case carried to the Supreme Court, a Commission order to cease and desist was voided because the Court took the position that all of the competitors of the respondent disclosed by the record had been equally guilty. The Court said it was not the business of the Government to protect one knave from another. Thus, no matter how much the public might be injured, the Commission may be powerless to give it the protection to which it is entitled. The proposed amendment would clear away doubt as to the Commission's jurisdiction. That is the purpose of the amendment.

For the most part the other amendments are either clarifying or procedural.

The fundamental purposes of the Federal Trade Commission Act and those sections of the Clayton Act of which the Commission has jurisdiction, are to eliminate unfair-trade practices and such practices as tend substantially to lessen competition or create monopolies. Some have felt that there has been a tendency in recent years away from these purposes; that there has been a lessening of the public demand for enforcement of the antimonopoly laws. In my judgment, this tendency has been fostered on the one hand by selfish interests whose practices these laws were intended to stop, and on the other by a growing belief that preservation of competition was an economic fallacy and mistake. I do not believe it can be successfully denied that this latter belief has been artificially encouraged. It is easy to say that because great enterprises exist in considerable number, and are frequently able to operate at low cost, the public interest would be better served by their encouragement than by their regulation or elimination. But this argument fails to take into account the disastrous results to the public which usually follow the concentration of an enterprise largely or almost exclusively in a few large units. Experience has shown that the capacity some large businesses may have to give the public the benefit of low prices is often exercised only at great cost to themselves, a cost which even they can afford only temporarily. It is as true now as when the laws against monopolies were passed, that once success has attended efforts of large enterprises to drive from the field the small competitors who cannot meet these temporarily lowered prices without fatal loss to themselves, such selfish interests usually raise prices to even higher levels than they were before.

It is my belief that the late severe economic depression can be traced in large degree to reprehensible practices of selfish interests, many of which were unsoundly and excessively capitalized. These practices were not properly controlled, because the country had become so blinded by temporary prosperity as to accept the theory that monopolies were beneficial rather than dangerous.

What happened? In their greed for profit monopolistic enterprises charged more than the traffic could bear. They had no regard for ultimate consequences. By eliminating competition they thought they were on their way to greater success and greater riches. Actually, however, as it turned out, fewer people were able to buy the products of the big business enterprises which had concentrated output in their own hands, for that very concentration deprived many of their means of livelihood and thus destroyed their purchasing power. The result, so often called "overproduction", would probably better be termed "underconsumption."

It is my conviction that to allow great interests a free hand and permit them to destroy competition is not only disadvantageous to a principle on which our Government was established; that is, equal opportunity for all who may be fitted to improve their position by reason of their own energy and initiative. By this I do not mean that it was ever intended to protect the lazy or incompetent. I do mean that the right of every man to use his brain and energy and gain a fair reward therefor should be preserved and protected.

If we are to accept the process of concentration of business in a few hands as beyond control, then it is time to admit that our foremost national aim, individual opportunity, has been lost, and that what we had believed was our outstanding national trait, individual initiative, either has failed or is no longer worth preserving.

I am afraid we have been taking the sturdiness of American individualism too much for granted. It is time we examined into this American characteristic and decided whether we are to use it or lose it. If we are to abandon this trait, either we place ourselves at the mercy of selfish combinations or we must stake more and more reliance on government.

For my part, I hold that through wise enactments the rights of the individual should be protected, and that individual initiative and capacity should have a fair chance to assert themselves honestly and efficiently, and receive the just reward to which they are entitled.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire how many speeches are going to be made before we commence the regular business for today?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding, but I will object to any other request along this line because we want to proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman withhold his request so that I may propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I withhold my request.

THE CURSE OF RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on religious freedom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, to my mind there is nothing more frightful and horrible than the ravages, rapine, pillage, and suffering caused by religious bigotry—of the type now prevailing in turbulent Germany not only against Catholics and Jews but against Protestants as well. The National Conference of Jews and Christians, an organization of genuine brotherhood, is working with might and main in our country to instill in the hearts and minds of the citizenry everywhere the thought that all constitutional rights should be accorded free and openly to all persons regardless of religion, race, or color.

In my city of Brooklyn the antidefamation committee of the B'nai B'rith order is lending the weight of its influence to spread this good gospel of brotherhood. The Brooklyn lodge adopted a resolution recently, which I am pleased to present:

At a general meeting of B'nai B'rith, Brooklyn Lodge, held at Temple Beth Emmeth of Flatbush, 1510 Church Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., on February 26, 1936, the following resolution was offered and unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it is the function of the antidefamation committee of B'nai B'rith, Brooklyn Lodge, to combat prejudice and discrimination against race, creed, or color, and it is the declared policy of the committee to accomplish its end through the medium of enlightenment and education rather than retaliation; and

"Whereas the National Conference of Jews and Christians set aside February 23, 1936, as Brotherhood Day; and

"Whereas the President of the United States delivered a radio address in celebration of Brotherhood Day, in which he enthusiastically supported its purposes and encouraged an alliance of faiths, urging that people of different faiths 'reach across the lines between their creeds, clasp hands, and make common cause': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the President of the United States is deserving of praise and commendation for his straightforward and fearless address on the subject; and be it further

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the membership of B'nai B'rith, Brooklyn Lodge, that other public officials, national, State, and local, candidates for public office, and political groups and organizations, should on the appropriate occasions, by word and action, contribute to the enlightenment of their constituents by publicly encouraging good will, good-fellowship, and the 'good-neighbor idea' so aptly discussed by the President of the United States in his radio address; and be it further

"Resolved, That the president of B'nai B'rith, Brooklyn Lodge, be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to express the appreciation and gratitude of the membership to the President of the United States and to transmit a copy of this resolution to the press and to such others as may be interested in its subject matter."

PENNY-WISE—POUND-FOOLISH

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Federal Register.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, my dear friend, Mr. LUDLOW, in a speech which appears in Monday's RECORD attacked: First, the cost of printing the daily Federal Register; second, the cost of printing the compilations of administrative rules and regulations now in force and effect; third, the sales appeal of the new publication; and fourth, the so-called bureaucratic growth of the Division of the Federal Register in The National Archives.

Also the very able gentleman from Missouri, my dear friend, Mr. COCHRAN, has been similarly disparaging the publication of the Federal Register. Both these gentlemen deprecate the cost and the additional expense to the Government. I say to both, that in their opposition they are but penny-wise—pound-foolish.

COST OF THE FEDERAL REGISTER

The gentleman is correctly informed in saying that the appropriation to the Government Printing Office for printing the Federal Register amounts to $225,000 from March 14, 1936, to March 1, 1937.

In October of 1934 a special committee consisting of John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce; Harold M. Stephens, Assistant Attorney General; Erwin N. Griswold, Department of Justice; J. G. Laylin, Treasury Department; Jerome Frank, Agricultural Adjustment Administration; D. J. Haykin, Library of Congress; and Cyril Wynn, Department of State, which was appointed by the National Emergency Council, submitted a report respecting a proposed official publication. The report as submitted included an estimate of the office of the Public Printer stating that the 16-page paper could be issued 5 days a week, with appropriate indexes, at a cost of $52,000. At the same time the committee estimated the total annual pay roll at $34,000. As stated by the Administrative Secretary of The National Archives in his letter to Representative LUDLOW on March 19, 1936, the total annual pay roll is now $38,320, and no increase in personnel is contemplated. The increase in actual expenditures over the estimates made by the special committee is almost entirely in the printing cost. The printing appropriation took into account a 32-page paper. It appears at the present time that a 16-page paper will be sufficient to carry all Government rules and regulations except in cases of an emergency. For this reason, and in view of the fact that the amount appropriated for printing is approximately five times the estimate made in December of 1934, it would seem probable that a considerable saving may be made in this regard.

By the coordination of printing activities of the various departments of the Government and the Federal Register, it may be possible to use the same type and it will doubtless be possible to cut down on the volume of publications issued by the various departments, with the further possibility that publication of the Federal Register may eliminate the necessity of certain miscellaneous Government publications. It is believed that a considerable saving can be made by coordinating printing practices in this manner.

COST OF PRINTING THE COMPILATION REQUIRED UNDER SECTION 11 OF THE FEDERAL REGISTER ACT

The gentleman from Indiana, referring to the compilation required by section 11 of the Federal Register Act, has stated that the printing of the vast accumulation of governmental orders, regulations, and so forth, would be like publishing all out of doors and the cost would be unfathomable. The gentleman is incorrectly informed in this particular. His statement is doubtless based on the assertion of Mr. Giegen-gack, the Public Printer, who was quoted as having testified before the legislative Subcommittee on Appropriations, as follows:

It is impossible to give any idea as to what it will eventually cost to print the present accumulation of existing orders, proclamations, and regulations that now have the force and effect of law. It has been stated that there are literally truck loads of them, and that the Archivist would need to increase his building 100 percent in order to hold them all.

In this Mr. Giegen-gack was misinformed. He evidently had in mind all of the files of Federal agencies which are to be selected for removal to The Archives Building. I am informed that there are only 18 file drawers containing compilations submitted under the provisions of section 11 of the Federal Register Act, which are now in the Division of the Federal Register. Thirteen of these file drawers contain documents submitted by departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Government and five file drawers contain Executive orders issued by the President. Of this material, a substantial portion will be discarded as not eligible for publication, for preliminary examination shows that numerous documents that have been submitted are not of the type which Congress intended to have published under the Federal Register Act.

DEMAND FOR THE FEDERAL REGISTER

The gentleman from Indiana expressed concern over the small number of subscribers to the Federal Register. At the present time Government agencies have requested approximately 3,000 copies; Congressmen and Senators have requested approximately 1,200 copies; depository libraries receive 500 copies; and the Library of Congress 125 copies. Since the Federal Register started publication subscriptions have been received at the Government Printing Office at the rate of 25 per day, and it is expected that subscriptions will continue to be received until approximately 15,000 copies are distributed daily.

The leading private tax service reporting changes in tax law, from Washington, has 15,000 subscribers, and it is the belief of the Washington representative of that service that the Federal Register will ultimately have at least that many subscribers, especially if the subscription price can be kept at a reasonable figure. There are approximately 150,000 subscribers of the various services of this publishing house in connection with administrative agencies in Washington and approximately 75,000 subscribers to the services of its leading competitor. The subscription price of each of these services is higher than the year's subscription rate of the Federal Register. For this reason it seems probable that the Federal Register will steadily gain in the number of its subscribers and that within a reasonable length of time a substantial portion, if not all, of the cost of the Register will be borne by the subscriber.

The reaction on the part of the general public since the start of publication of the Federal Register has been, on the whole, favorable. The New York Times, for March 15, 1936, states:

A survey by the American Bar Association which pointed to the need of the legislation showed a wide potential demand for such a daily record among attorneys, newspaper editors, scholars, and business men.

The Brooklyn Eagle, in an editorial appearing in its March 17 issue, states:

The United States has long been the only great nation without an official gazette, the nearest approach being the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which, however, covers only the transactions and debates of the House and Senate and appears only while Congress is in session. The authorization of such a publication, to be known as the Federal Register, the first issue which appeared Saturday, is therefore belated recognition of a need that has been even more pressing than usual during the past 3 years.

If the expense seems to mount too high, we suggest that corresponding savings could be made with the greatest ease in the cost of the bulky, though sometimes extremely diverting, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with no loss whatever except to the privilege of Senators and Representatives of "extending remarks" therein, which frequently have no bearing whatever on the deliberations of those august bodies.

The Indianapolis News, the largest evening newspaper in the State so ably represented by the gentleman from Indiana, in an editorial dated March 16, 1936, states:

They were reprimanded (the New Dealers) by the Supreme Court in the "hot oil" case and reminded that one of the first duties of government is to see that the people have a reasonable opportunity to know the law. In these days, when Congress gives its lawmaking powers to the Executive, and he empowers bureaus and departments to issue orders having the effect of law, this is very important.

During the past 3 days inquiries and subscriptions received by letter at the Division of the Federal Register alone represent the following States: Arizona, California, Colorado, District of Columbia, George, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Washington.

NEED FOR AN OFFICIAL GOVERNMENTAL PUBLICATION

In the December 1934 issue of the Harvard Law Review Dr. Erwin N. Griswold states that systematic publication of administrative rules and regulations is in effect in England, Australia, Ireland, Canada, India, New Zealand, South Africa, and similar publications are common in the Latin countries. He states further "that apart from the United States it would be very difficult to find a nation of importance which does not use some method to make available and accessible a record of the acts of its executive authorities."

Judge Harold Stephens, of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the man who argued the "hot oil" case in his capacity as assistant to the Attorney General, stated at the hearings of the Committee on the Judiciary a month ago:

* * * It is idle to attempt to know what the law is today without knowing what the regulations are or the Executive orders; and I as a lawyer and a judge say that we have no dependable source for obtaining those laws and regulations at the present time.

Assistant Attorney General John Dickinson, appearing at the same hearings, advanced the argument that the small-town lawyer and the small-town businessmen have a right to know what the law is on a given subject as much as the large law firms and large corporations with their continuous Washington contacts. He was of the opinion that the body of administrative law should be available in every county seat in the form of an official gazette published by the Government as a complementary publication to the United States Code.

Statutory and administrative law are complementary, and both must be available if one is to know the law on any subject on which rule-making power has been delegated. The United States Code and the Statutes at Large furnish the citizen with statutory law, but until the Federal Register came into being there was no similar source for rules and regulations with the force and effect of law.

The fact that ignorance of the publication and its comparative newness has kept the early list of subscribers at a small figure does not affect the legality of the regulations which are issued daily from having the same force and effect of law as the statutes which we pass daily. I personally believe that the paid subscription list of the Federal Register will grow steadily until it approximates or surpasses the paid subscription lists of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or the Statutes at Large.

In the past regulations have been issued in a very informal manner; in some instances circular letters, press releases, and other informal documents have contained regulatory material, and violation of these regulations so issued have carried penalties. Although certain Government departments and agencies are required by statute to give official notice of certain acts, there was, before the publication of the Federal Register, no medium through which these notices might be given officially. Up to the present time there has been no comprehensive manner in which Government offices in the field might be advised of rules and regulations. Inquiries are repeatedly forwarded to Government departments from Government representatives outside of Washington, which will be to a large extent unnecessary now, in view of the fact that the Federal Register provides the answers to these questions.

Numerous Supreme Court cases have held that Executive regulations, properly made, have the force and effect of law. Since no publication of these administrative rules was contained in an official document which all might obtain, it was impossible for the average citizen to ascertain all the regulations which might affect him.

In the early part of the nineteenth century Jeremy Bentham, English philosopher and jurist, wrote:

We hear of tyrants, and those cruel ones; but whatever we may have felt we have never heard of any tyrant in such sort cruel as to punish men for disobedience to laws or orders which he had kept them from the knowledge of.

Slightly over a year ago the Supreme Court decided a case on the assumption that the regulations of a Government bureau of some years' standing were known to those dealing with it, and yet the bureau itself spent 2 months in an intensive search before the particular document involved could be found. It is true that the "hot oil" case which focused attention on the lack of a central agency for inspection and publication of administrative rules and regulations was an extreme example. Naturally very few cases reach the Supreme Court before anyone discovers that the section of administrative law on which they are based has been eliminated by Executive order. There are many cases which are as illustrative of the principle, on which attention has not been focused, and these cases are bound to increase as the body of administrative law increases. Several such cases were cited by Dr. Griswold, of the Harvard Law School, in his testimony before the Committee on the Judiciary last month. It is impossible for Congress to abolish the delegation of rule-making power to the Department of State, the Department of Commerce, and so forth, and it would seem unwise to relax the old common-law maxim, "Ignorantia juris non excusat", to any great extent. The only remedy is to make the rules and regulations available for public inspection and by publication furnish them to all the public at a reasonable subscription price before any such documents having general applicability and legal effect shall be binding on our citizens.

The same logic which would lead us to economize by cutting out the Federal Register would lead us to cut out the Statutes at Large and the Supreme Court decisions on the ground that interested parties could write in when they wanted to ascertain the law.

It is true that the common-law maxim stated that ignorance of the law excuses no one. There has been a relaxation of this rule of necessity. Although it may be quite proper to relax the penalty which is exacted for ignorance of the law, it would seem preferable to take steps to make the law easily available to all people who may be bound thereby.

One of the most severe and outspoken critics of so-called bureaucracy in the Federal Government has stated in a recent book:

It is a maxim of our jurisprudence that ignorance of the law excuses no one; but that maxim was evolved over a period of ages when our law was easily discoverable, if not known, in our statute books. The rule becomes preposterous, when law may be ground out in a daily torrent by administrative agencies which may be under no duty even to publish the same.

BUREAUCRACY

It has already been stated that the appropriations for salaries of the members of the staff of the Division of the Federal Register is approximately the same as that estimated to be necessary by an impartial committee of Government experts before I introduced the Federal Register bill in this House a year ago. By far the major portion of the appropriation is for printing, and a substantial saving on the appropriation should be made.

One of the major evils of bureaucracy as the gentleman from Indiana defines it is, in my opinion, the fear which it instills in the average citizen of punishing him for violation of rules of which he is not aware. The Federal Register will remove this fear, and I firmly believe that it will stand as one of the foremost of the many constructive achievements accomplished by this administration.

CONCLUSION

During the hearings before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of which I was chairman on the Cochran bill to abolish the Federal Register, our genial and distinguished friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DRISCOLL] vigorously opposed the Cochran bill and emphasized the need for the Federal Register. Among other things, he drew attention to the activities of a certain Roman Emperor who posted his decrees so high that his subjects could not read them, and then punished them for violation thereof. The Library of Congress gives me a report taken from the 1883 edition of Alexander Thomson's translation of Suetonius' Lives of the Twelve Caesars. The quotation on page 278, paragraph 40, of Thomson's translation points out Emperor Caligula as the guilty tyrant. Suetonius wrote about 120 A. D. The quotation is as follows:

These taxes being imposed, but the act by which they were levied never submitted to public inspection, great grievances were experienced from the want of sufficient knowledge of the law. At length, on the urgent demands of the Roman people, he published the law, but it was written in a very small hand and posted up in a corner so that no one could make a copy of it.

Apparently our friends from Missouri and Indiana, Representatives COCHRAN and LUDLOW, would have our Government ape the tyrant Emperor Caligula. In fact, they would even go Caligula one better. Whereas he at least wrote the decrees in a very small hand and posted them in such a way that nobody could copy them, our good friends from Indiana and Missouri would have our Government not even publish the rules and regulations so that they could not even be seen under any circumstances.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed for 5 minutes?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know whether other Members who have unanimous-consent requests to propound are going to be recognized before the regular business is taken up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize all Members for unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, as we have to wait only 5 minutes while the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes his address and these unanimous-consent requests may be made afterward, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am asking for this time to speak of the condition of the Twenty-seventh District and specifically of the city of Johnstown, Pa. I am not going to make any remarks about what the flood has done up there except to say it has prostrated the city.

At the time of the business collapse in 1929, or shortly thereafter, the largest bank between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh in the State of Pennsylvania, the First National Bank of Johnstown, failed. It closed. Some people did not agree as to the wisdom of closing the bank and whether it should have been closed or not, but that is water over the dam. Johnstown is in the heart of a mining and steel center of Pennsylvania. The recovery program of the Roosevelt administration had not had time to favorably affect Johnstown and its vicinity until 4 or 5 weeks ago, when an upturn was noted. The city has been visited by a second disastrous flood, resulting in property damage far greater than resulted from the flood of 1889. The people have no money to pay the encumbrances on their homes and business properties, to pay taxes, or for any other purpose.

Mr. Speaker, the city of Johnstown has a bonded indebtedness of $5,000,000. The school district of the city of Johnstown has a bonded indebtedness in excess of $4,000,000. I do not know what can be done by the present legislative set-up in Washington, but something should be done in regard to new legislation if we do not have legislation at the present time to cover the situation. To give you a definite idea of the thought of the people of Johnstown, I have before me this morning the first issue of the Johnstown Democrat that has been published since the flood last week. In an editorial in this paper there is given a very plain exposition of the needs of the people. The editorial follows:

CREDIT AND REHABILITATION

Johnstown, members of its council, the State authorities, Members of the Congress, the President, members of his Cabinet, and the heads of various governmental spending agencies face a series of definite problems which have arisen as a result of the recent dampness in our valley.

Recent events have impaired, if they have not well destroyed, the credit of the city, the Johnstown school district, and Cambria County. There are certain things the Government can do within the range of existing law.

The collection of any considerable amount of delinquent taxes becomes highly improbable. The Federal Government can advance the face of the municipal, school district, and county tax duplicate. The properties are worth the tax—some time. The Government would get its money back—eventually. Moreover, if a proper survey and appraisal were made, it would be possible to ascertain who was and who was not in a position to pay taxes for the year 1936. The Government could assume the burden of current tax delinquencies.

There is another matter in which the Federal Government, under the cover of existing law, could supplement, fortify, and protect the credit of the municipality, the school district, and the county. The Government could refund existing debt at a nominal interest rate. Bondholders could properly be required to surrender their bonds at their face value. Outstanding indebtedness should be refinanced at a rate not to exceed 1 percent.

If the full measure of the assistance suggested were actually extended, the Government would not lose a cent in the long run, while the current obligations of the city, the school district, and the county would be reduced at least 40 percent.

If there is a failure to act along the lines suggested, the city, the Johnstown school district, and, eventually, the county will be compelled to default.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOLAND. If I understand the gentleman's remarks correctly, it is imperative that the Government here, particularly the R. F. C., extend their efforts and their credit to allow Johnstown and its citizens, especially its businessmen, the use of money immediately?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes. I do not know whether that can be done or not, but if it cannot be done under existing law, provision should be made so that this may be accomplished.

Mr. BOLAND. In other words, it is imperative that Congress extend Johnstown that remedy?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes. There is no question about that. It is undisputed and recognized by every man and woman who knows anything about financial conditions in the city and the county of Cambria.

I am not sure that existing laws contain the enactments by which the needed help can be extended. A hundred thousand people stricken by calamity after calamity cannot be expected to bear their burden without assistance from somewhere, and the place where it should come from is here in Washington.

It must not be understood that I am standing here for myself or for the city of Johnstown, trying to panhandle from the Federal Treasury or wheedle something from it, with no thought or expectation of paying back in full measure. The residents of Johnstown, of Cambria County, and of any of the devastated towns and communities of the Twenty-seventh District of Pennsylvania and of the entire State are not that kind of people. They are not beggars or bums or raiders of the storehouses of the Government.

I do not have by any means a complete report of the flood damaged areas, but mention must be made of numerous places in the four counties comprising the Twenty-seventh District where, according to my information, the helping hand of the Federal Government will have to reach out in a sympathetic and practical manner. Offhand I mention Blairsville, North Vandergrift, Apollo, Leechburg, Rossiter, Punxsutawney, Brookville; and there probably are numerous other communities that demand attention and assistance.

Thanks to the various relief agencies, immediate needs are being taken care of as well as could be expected. The various posts of the veterans' organizations have responded nobly. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Spanish War Veterans, their auxiliaries, camps, and posts, the Red Cross, the churches of all denominations, fraternal orders of every kind. Nothing could fill the heart of man with warmer impulses than the response to the necessities of the afflicted. And, most of all, has been the inspiration of the individuals of every walk and condition of life to the noblest and best that is in human nature.

But, Mr. Speaker, with all that wonderful exhibition of bravery and mercy and endurance manifested by the people of Cambria, Armstrong, Indiana, and Jefferson Counties, something else remains to be done, and only the Federal Government can do that or those particular things.

If there is no present authority for it, then a new governmental agency must be established or the powers of some one or more of the existing agencies for recovery must be enlarged and broadened to care for the needs of the sorely pressed people of the flooded areas in the United States.

My thought is that a new agency should be created for the express purpose of extending credit to the business people to reestablish themselves on a going basis and the home owners who are now, may I say, homeless. The credit should be long-term, the interest rate merely to cover the service charges of the Government, and the regulations to be met must be liberal and broad.

We need at this time, above all things, a brave spirit and an optimistic outlook. But we must not be ignorant optimists. The strain will eventually tell on the best of men on the long hard pull back up the hill. We can be optimists and yet be sensible. In the long pull, it is what the Federal Government does that will count the most.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I object. I stated before that I was going to object to any other remarks.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a brief letter from Mr. Clark, captain of the Reserve Officers' Association, and my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Capt. H. H. H. Clark, of the Reserve Officers' Association, and my reply thereto:

RESERVE OFFICERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Missoula, Mont., March 10, 1936.

Hon. JOSEPH P. MONAGHAN,
Montana Congressional Representative,
United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MONAGHAN: It comes to my attention that you have consistently opposed all legislation in Congress which has had the support of our organization. I have gone to the trouble of verifying these reports through a perusal of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS. Your point of view in opposition to national defense is not understandable to us. I am writing to inform you that it is our duty to bring these facts to the attention of our membership through the medium of the Montana Reservist. However, I feel it only fair on our part to grant to you an opportunity to defend your position within the limits of the editorial policy of the publication.

It is not our policy to enter into any political controversies, but we do desire to avail ourselves of every legitimate means to further our constitutional purposes.

May I hear from you at your early convenience, and I assure you that I shall, if possible, see that your reply will be published in an early issue of our paper.

Very truly yours,

H. H. H. CLARK,
Captain, Infantry Reserve, President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1936.

Capt. H. H. H. CLARK,
President, Reserve Officers Association of the United States,
Missoula, Mont.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN CLARK: I have before me your letter of March 10, relative to my stand on national defense. In response to same, will refer you to chapter XVIII, verse 23, of St. John:

"Jesus answered him. 'If I have spoken evil, give testimony of the evil; but if well, why strikest thou me?'"

A reading of the entire chapter would be well worth your time. With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Very cordially yours,

JOSEPH P. MONAGHAN.

IRELAND'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a St. Patrick's Day speech, delivered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by my colleague the Honorable MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Ohio, at Detroit, Mich., on March 17, 1936, under the auspices of the Knights of Equity and the National Order of Hibernians:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, at the outset permit me to thank you and your committee for affording me the opportunity to come to this busy industrial center of America on the occasion of St. Patrick's Day to meet with many old friends and representatives of the united Irish groups of this city.

St. Patrick's Day universally celebrated, as it has been for centuries, sometimes loses its significance in the character of the many so-called celebrations in honor of Ireland's patron saint. St. Patrick was essentially a religious leader, and embodied with all the attributes of a civic leader. He left a heritage unsurpassed by any of the renowned characters that have appeared on the stage of time. Bloodshed was customary when missionaries invaded pagan countries to plant the cross of the true faith. But the singular feat of St. Patrick in taking and converting a reputed hostile pagan nation to Christianity without loss of blood or life is unparalleled.

History has woven many stories of folklore and tradition around the great saint whose feast we celebrate today, but it is my humble opinion that his outstanding contribution to the world was the conversion of Ireland from paganism to Christianity. Had this not occurred, one hesitates to envision the religious, social, and economic conditions that would have followed in the centuries after his death. He left an Isle that was known far and wide as the land of saints and scholars. This was true in the literal sense. One has only to delve into the archives of history to ascertain the facts substantiating the appellation, "Ireland, the land of saints and scholars", as a result of his efforts. Temples of worship and institutions of learning flourished in all parts of Ireland. In remote valleys and on the hill-sides Irish monks labored over crude manuscripts, creating the foundation of our present modern civilization.

When the ruthless hand of the invader sought to destroy the laborious work perfected by these saintly disciples of St. Patrick, somehow they managed to salvage the one essential to the preservation of civilization, namely, the recorded history of the past and their arguments for sustaining their belief in the immortal trinity, illustrated and symbolically portrayed by St. Patrick in his reference to the shamrock.

Many of us have stood in reverence at the threshold of Muck-cross Abbey in Killarney and at small shrines in rooms scattered throughout Ireland. In retrospect, it was not difficult to observe the Irish monks fleeing from their native soil and their temples of learning with naught but the clothes on their backs and their precious manuscripts. To all parts of the continent they went, transplanting the seeds of learning, as evidenced in the cultural development of Spain, Italy, Belgium, France, and many other Catholic countries.

The thirteenth, sometimes called the darkest of centuries, was in fact the Renaissance—the beginning of the restoration of culture and education in Europe, due principally to the courage, perseverance, and loyalty of the Irish to the Christian faith implanted by St. Patrick. Despite famine, plague, war, and the curse of illiteracy, the lamp of faith burns more brightly today than ever in the history of the Emerald Isle.

One Sunday in July not long ago I was privileged to stand on the summit of Crough Patrick, overlooking Clew Bay in County Mayo, Ireland, which permits on a clear day a splendid view of the broad Atlantic. This is the sacred spot where St. Patrick made his last novena, and history recites his prayer was: "That come what may, even though adversities be heavy, the Irish people would never lose their faith." I saw on that day of their annual pilgrimage in excess of 30,000 men, women, and children ascend the rugged mountain to attend divine service on the spot where St. Patrick knelt for the last time, and I was satisfied his prayer was answered and he had not lived in vain. In large part the pilgrims represented the peasantry of Ireland. Many of them in bare feet climbed over sharp stones in their pathway to the top. They were the sons and daughters of ancestors, who in the dark days of religious proscription protected the priests in the lonely hide-outs among the mountains of Ireland, when they offered the Sacrifice of the Mass.

It was such a spirit that infused the millions of Irish immigrants, who came to the United States to seek an asylum and escape from the cruel economic conditions that forced them to an almost state of slavery. The greatest contribution Ireland made to the United States was her exiled sons and daughters, who laid the foundation of the progress the Catholic Church enjoys in this land today. They were the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. Ireland's immigrant sons built the railroads, the canals, and commercial institutions that were destined to mark this Republic the greatest industrial and agricultural nation in the world.

Because of a forced illiteracy they had a deep appreciation of the value of education and the higher culture of life. No sacrifice was too great for educational opportunities for their children. Many Irish immigrants lived to see the suppressed ambition of their hearts and minds take form in the person of a Carroll, a Gibbons, a Kendrick, who became princes of the church in this country. They lived to behold the suppressed ambition of their hearts and minds realized in the successful career of a Victor Herbert in the field of music, a Cohan in the realm of the stage, and a Bourke Cockran in the Halls of Congress, and a Ford in the field of industry. Oh, yes; there were numerous Kellys, Burkes, and Sheas who reached the pinnacle of success in the religious, civic, and commercial life of the young Republic.

Sometimes we are accused of being overzealous in narrating the exploits of our race, and in referring to the substantial contributions made by them to the United States. We make no apology for our heritage; we make no apology for the contributions of the Irish to the United States. We answer in the words of John Boyle O'Reilly, a son of the old sod exiled to Van Dieman's land because he dared to advocate freedom for his fellowmen. After his escape from prison in Australia he came to the United States to become one of America's foremost writers and poets.

I repeat we make no apology, and we join in the sentiments expressed by John Boyle O'Reilly in responding to our critics: "No treason we bring from Erin—nor bring we shame nor guilt! The sword we hold may be broken, but we have not dropped the hilt!

The wreath we bear to Columbia is twisted of thorns, not bays;
And the songs we sing are saddened by thoughts of desolate days.
But the hearts we bring for freedom are washed in the surge of tears;
And we claim our rights by a people's fight outliving a thousand years."

The pitiable, heart-rending scene of an Irishman, woman, or child leaving the native land to journey and seek asylum in the four corners of the world is indelibly imprinted on the minds of many still living. They are called a nationless people and are subservient to the domination of a foreign foe, but liberty and the love of country is to them a fetish. Where in the wide world would you behold such a scene as is often witnessed in Ireland—the immigrant leaving his native land and parting from his loved ones embracing the gate post; yes, kissing the very ground sustaining the humble thatched cottage. The scene adequately demonstrates the love and loyalty to the traditions implanted by the saint whose memory we honor today.

In these days of economic distress and world-wide governmental transition, Ireland's contribution to the United States can be better appraised today than ever before. The Irish immigrants in addition to clearing the forests and developing this modern Republic—the greatest on earth—made secure the principles necessary to maintaining a form of government based upon Christian precepts. Scarcely was there an Irish home that did not send forth young men and women with vocational calling to the services of the true God. They labored unceasingly, sustained by a poor but generous people who from their hard-earned meager resources gave money sufficient to build the thousands of churches whose spires rise in the villages, towns, and cities throughout the Nation as a monument to the generosity of the Irish immigrant.

Occasionally and only recently in Congress implied reference was made to the Irish servant girl. Their contribution to this great Nation cannot be referred to in any spirit of scorn or condemnation. The old story is illustrative of the point I am seeking to make. It is told some 40 years ago two old Irishwomen were seated on the curbstone in front of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City, waiting for the passing of a parade. Looking up with joy at the magnificent cathedral one said to the other, "Mary, it is a beautiful building." And Mary received this reply from Bridget: "It is, indeed, a beautiful building, Mary, and just to think that your 10 cents and my 10 cents put that building up." There was more truth than poetry in the remark of the old Irishwoman. It was the thin dimes of the poor Irish that made possible the erection of the lofty churches in America.

Aside from the contributions of our race to the arts, sciences, professions, and the worth-while avocations of life, unchallenged is the record of service in the military affairs of this country. In every land where Irishmen fought their brother's battle for freedom one undying wish was dominant; whether with the wild geese on the continent of Europe, or with a Patrick Sarsfield, who, mortally wounded on Flander's field, exhaling his last breath, said, "Would that this blood were shed for Ireland." So with the Irish immigrants and their sons who fought with Washington from Concord to Yorktown, at Bunker Hill, at Valley Forge, and in every engagement of the Colonial troops they made splendid contributions. It is historical record that close to 50 percent of the enlisted personnel under General Washington were men of Irish birth, or Irish descent, and that one-third of the generals were of Irish blood. Can the Nation ever forget the contribution of Jack Barry, the founder of the American Navy, and the son of a Wexford farmer, who, when offered 20,000 guineas and a command of the British fleet if he would desert the service of the American Navy, replied:

"Not the value and command of the whole British fleet can seduce me from the cause of my country."

Except for propaganda that I shall refer to hereafter, Barry would now be proclaimed the father of the American Navy, the honor now accorded to John Paul Jones.

We cannot forget that of the first eight brigadier generals of the American Revolution two were Irish. General Montgomery fell mortally wounded at the Battle of Quebec. General Sullivan against terrific odds fought the Hessians desperately at the Battle of Long Island. Later he participated in the siege of Brandywine, Germantown, and Trenton. Some of the other Irishmen who distinguished themselves were the Moores, Rutledges, Jacksons, Polks, Calhouns from the States of North and South Carolina. Two of them became Presidents of the United States. Every schoolboy remembers with delight his history tale of Patrick Henry, who rose in the house of the Virginia delegates and expounded the philosophy that he preferred death to the denial of liberty. He was of noble Irish birth, and one of the most powerful influences in the Revolution. Can we forget it was General Moylan who was Washington's close friend and confidant in the trying days of the Revolution? Can we forget that on a similar occasion, such as we are celebrating today, March 17, 1776, the password was "St. Patrick" among Washington's soldiers?

When the Union was imperiled and a civil war was necessary to preserve the status quo, men of Irish blood enlisted by the thousands in the Union Army, again demonstrating their courage and their loyalty to their adopted land. Scores of men like Sheridan, Sherman, and others led the Union forces to victory. Is there any doubt as to the major part played by the enlisted personnel in the Civil War? Then turn to the historical documents and peruse the pages indented with the names of the Kellys, Burkes, and Sheas, and countless Irish of that historical period. Go to Arlington Cemetery, situated outside the District line of the Capital City, in Virginia, the resting place of the Nation's soldier dead, and read inscribed on the tombstones the names of the Irish who died that this Nation might endure.

Within the memory of our friends at this gathering tonight is the generous contribution of the Irish-American boys in the last World War. The war we thought was fought to save the world for democracy. Irrespective of the issue whether it was a just or an unjust war, and that question is mooted today more than ever before, we cannot overlook the part played by those of our blood in that world catastrophe.

I recall going through the American cemetery at Belleau Woods and the other cemeteries at Soissons and along the Marne, and reading on the white crosses that mark the last resting place of the American dead the names of Murphy, O'Donnell, O'Malley, O'Brien, McGinty, and many, many more. These dead were scions of that old stock who loved liberty more than life, and were never afraid to make the supreme sacrifice to insure happiness for posterity.

Having made such splendid contribution, and recognizing credit, honor, and respect due every other racial group for the part played by men and women of their blood in the creation and preservation of this Republic, we feel we have a unique position, an obligation to insist that this Nation be free from intrigue and influence of the ancient enemy of Ireland and this Republic. I refer to Great Britain. I am not afraid of the accusation of "twisting the lion's tail", because we dare to expose the machinations of imperialistic Britain in her efforts to control, if not destroy, this the oldest Republic on earth.

Since the last redcoat left our shores after Washington's victory, a consistent propaganda and effort has been made to align us again with the so-called "mother country." Recently, I had occasion to render my feeble protest against the action of the House of Representatives in adjourning Congress in respect to the memory of the late British King, George V. I read to Congress an excerpt from a book called "Triumph of Democracy", published in 1893 by Andrew Carnegie, as follows:

"Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever.

"Let men say what they will; therefore, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and American united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited state, the 'British-American Union.'"

The Carnegie Foundation for International Peace, the English Speaking Union, and the Sulgrave Institution are the spearheads of this movement. I would add to the group the Rhodes Scholarship, the purpose of which few Americans are conscious. Cecil Rhodes, the diamond king of Africa, made his untold millions on the sweat and blood of the slaves employed in the diamond mines. This Englishman established a scholarship fund to finance two individuals each year from each of the 48 States of the Union through Oxford University. There to be trained in the philosophy of British economics and social problems. Invariably many of these young men return to the United States as missionaries advancing Great Britain's right to rule the world. It is disgusting, to say the least, to meet with some of the Oxford literati, who affect, after short training at this distinguished English university, the mannerisms and customs of the English, even to the extent of wearing, in many cases, the famed British monocle. I have no objection to anyone wearing a monocle, especially if he is British, and I probably could tolerate an American graduate of Oxford, due to the bounty of Cecil Rhodes, wearing the famed monocle, but I should like to have him see eye to eye with the Americans who have not forgotten the sufferings of Washington and his soldiers at Valley Forge, nor the tremendous sacrifices made to bring this Government into existence. It is such agencies that denied to Commodore Jack Barry his rightful place in American history as the founder of our American Navy. Every historical research and finding gives proof to the recognized claim of those who support the fact that Barry, from the standpoint of bravery and loyalty and sacrifice rendered, was the real father of the American Navy. These agencies, except for the protest of our people, would have led us blindly into the League of Nations and the World Court, to become the cat's-paw of Great Britain.

Let me pause here to pay a tribute to the shepherd of the Detroit diocese, Most Rev. Michael J. Gallagher. Not only is he an outstanding churchman but, to my way of thinking, one of the outstanding American citizens of our generation. He has not been afraid to speak as an American against the sordid influence of Britain in our international and domestic affairs, nor has he been fearful of defending those speaking for the meek and lowly, whose voices are inarticulate in these days of economic and social disorder. I publicly acclaim his defense of the right of a Catholic priest to discuss the ills of society, as analyzed in the encyclical of a Leo XIII or a Pius XI. I am glad to state, as one citizen of this country, that we have in this section a disciple of St. Patrick, approved and supported by his bishop, who is making history and who is playing a major part in saving this country from fascism and revolution; one who is respected by every liberty-loving American, irrespective of creed or racial origin.

Reviewing the record of the race briefly as I did tonight, I add to the illustrious contribution made by the men of our race the recent and present contributions made by Father Charles E. Coughlin, whose grandparents were born on the old sod. His courage in indicting the present capitalistic system and his admonition is going a long way to salvage what is left of that system, and lay the foundation for a more permanent structure where greed and avarice will be supplanted by the social justice that God Almighty intended his children to enjoy, whether they be under a capitalistic system or any other form of government.

Were I to leave any final message to this gathering, I would say not on St. Patrick's Day alone must we open the pages of history, but every day of our existence. Some thought should be given to the record of achievement that is ours, to the end that we may be able to play our part again in joining with our fellow Americans in protecting the integrity and the permanency of this our native land. I am not so naive as to pretend not to know that the barriers that made for isolation have broken down and that a better understanding must be had among the human families of the earth. The path to enduring peace is not by aggrandizement, or the seeking of more territory, or the subjection of more people under despotic rule. Our Nation stands ever ready to lead the way, but only upon the terms and conditions that we hold fast to the independence that is ours; that we take no part in any future war seeking on the part of the aggressor to crush the national aspirations of any people in a similar position to ours in the days of the American Revolution.

If we make any indictment against the British Government, with its skilled diplomacy and its dominion over one-third of the world's territory, we do so deliberately. We have no right to interfere in the internal affairs of the British Government, and we ask as a matter of reciprocity that they stop now and in the future from interfering in our domestic and international problems.

Perhaps today there is need for a more vital patriotism. Strange as it may seem, there is no more patriotic people, nor more loyal to the Crown, than the people of England. I discussed this situation with an English gentleman at the threshold of the House of Commons not so long ago. I was protesting the divine right of kings, the tremendous upkeep of the government, the high cost of supporting the royal family, with its dukes, earls, and other titled royal bloods, their costly estates, and their castles. All which seemed repugnant to me, and relics of days long past. It was during the reign of the Labor government of Ramsay MacDonald, and my friend replied in this fashion:

"I am a socialist at heart, and I believe in the Labor government of England. Our King is only a figurehead. Your President has much more power than he has, and we have more free speech in England than you have in the United States. Despite the fact that I agree with you in condemning the divine right of kings, I have reached the conclusion you have to have a head for your government, and in my mind no better head could we have than our King. Even though I despise royalty with all its veneer and trappings, don't you know when I see the royal coach coming down Piccadilly or the Strand there is a sort of a lump rises in my throat."

That, my friends, is what I call real patriotism. I have observed British students by the thousands going through the Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral, their teachers pointing out the last resting places of England's departed kings, statesmen, soldiers, writers, and instilling in youthful minds the glorious leadership of the British Empire.

I wish we could arrange for every boy and girl of high-school age in the United States to see the historic monuments at Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Washington, Yorktown; to visit Gettysburg and Bull Run; to kneel at the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon; to journey through our national cemetery at Arlington; and to bow their heads in reverence before the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Then, I believe we would have a healthy patriotism that would measure, if not surpass, the cultivated patriotism that England inculcates in her youth.

Our fathers, the Irish immigrants, left a legacy. That legacy was fidelity to church and state. They paved the way, and Miss Will Allen Dromgoole in her beautiful poem briefly epitomizes the ideal of our Irish ancestors. She says:

An old man, going a lone highway,
Came, at the evening, cold and gray,
To a chasm, vast and deep and wide,
Through which was flowing a sullen tide.
The old man crossed in the twilight dim;
The sullen stream had no fears for him;
But he turned, when safe on the other side,
And built a bridge to span the tide.
"Old man", said a fellow pilgrim, near,
"You are wasting strength with building here;
Your journey will end with the ending day;
You never again must pass this way;
You have crossed the chasm, deep and wide,
Why build you the bridge at the eventide?"

The builder lifted his old gray head:
"Good friend, in the path I have come", he said,
"There followeth after me today
A youth, whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm, that has been naught to me,
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be.
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim;
Good friend, I am building the bridge for him."

Well they played their part in establishing this Republic on a sound basis, destined to be the leading nation of the world and an asylum for the poor, the oppressed, the political and religious refugees, who even today have to flee from persecution in foreign lands.

Ireland, now experiencing a dual form of government, we trust through evolution will soon become a united country. Her struggle for independence will go on. The sacrifice of Robert Emmet, Wolfe Tone, John Mitchell, Patrick Pearse, Michael Collins, and a host of others are fresh in the minds of her people. Her struggle for centuries to regain the glory that was once acclaimed to her still goes on. We need not review the subject tonight. It is a sad but glorious story. She will in a time planned by Divine Providence take her place among the nations of the earth.

Hold fast to the idealism of Washington and his suffering soldiers of the Valley Forge days. Unite as never before with our fellow Americans, irrespective of creed or racial identity, in preserving the free institutions of the United States and eradicating any evil influence, be it communism, fascism, or imperialism, that aims to weaken the foundation and utterly destroy this the oldest Republic now existing. With Washington, we pray that the spirit of patriotism remain with us, and proclaim our duty as we see it after the fashion that he professed on that eventful night before the Battle of Trenton, when he said: "Put none but Americans on guard tonight."

THE ANTILOBBYING BILL

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 462), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 462

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11663, a bill to require reports of receipts and disbursements of certain contributions, to require the registration of persons engaged in attempting to influence legislation, to prescribe punishments for violation of this act, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

THE PORT OF NEW YORK DISTRICT

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address made by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address made by me in New York, as follows:

"Wake up, men and women of the great metropolitan area, as vital interests of yours are at stake, and are involved in the aggressive, competitive efforts of people and organizations, within and without your neighborhood, to nullify by arbitrary means some of the natural advantages which have been yours and especially of those who are residents and workers in what has been established as the port of New York district."

The words just quoted are the words spoken over the radio January 23, 1929, by the late Eugenius H. Outerbridge, former chairman of the Port of New York Authority.

No one was more alert to the importance of crossings between the States of New Jersey and New York. In recognition of his outstanding services and as a monument to his work the bridge connecting Tottenville, Staten Island, with Perth Amboy in New Jersey has been named the Outerbridge Crossing.

Well may his words be echoed tonight, more than 7 years later: "Wake up, men and women of the great metropolitan area."

There is cause to be aroused, for, although we have advanced in the development of crossings between the States, the burdensome tolls exacted for use of the tunnels and bridges are retarding commerce and bearing down heavily upon the businessman, the worker, and resident of the port district.

The tolls of which complaint is made are the tolls now levied upon vehicles on all port authority crossings.

It may be well here to mention the crossings between the States.

There are two tunnels maintained by private companies, the tunnel at Thirty-fourth Street operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for the use of its trains, the other operated from New York through Jersey City to Newark and Hoboken by the Hudson & Manhattan Railroad Co. as a rapid-transit line. These are not vehicular crossings, and are referred to only because they are crossings between the States. However, it may not be remiss to observe that the tube fare of 6 cents from lower New York to Jersey City stands out favorably in contrast to the tolls of the Port of New York Authority.

All other interstate crossings are operated, maintained, and controlled by the port authority. Of these there is one tunnel and four bridges. An additional tunnel is now in course of construction to run from West Thirty-eighth Street, New York to Weehawken.

The Holland Tunnel operated by the port authority was opened to traffic on November 13, 1927. It connects Canal Street in New York to Twelfth Street and Fourteenth Street, Jersey City. When it was built the cost was paid by the two States. New Jersey issued bonds to meet its share while New York raised its part by State taxation. Beginning April 21, 1930, the port authority operated this tunnel as agent for the two States down to March 1, 1931, when by concurrent legislation of the States the control, operation, tolls, and other revenue of the Holland Tunnel were vested in the port authority.

Now we come to the bridges under the jurisdiction of the port authority.

The earliest of these were the Arthur Kill bridges. They are named the Outerbridge Crossing, connecting Tottenville, Staten Island, and Perth Amboy, N. J.; and the Goethals Bridge, linking Howland Hook, Staten Island, and Elizabeth, N. J. Both were opened to traffic June 29, 1928.

The next bridge built by the port authority was opened to traffic October 25, 1931. It is the great George Washington Bridge, spanning the Hudson River from One Hundred and Seventy-eighth Street, New York, to Fort Lee, N. J.

Shortly afterward the port authority, on November 15, 1931, opened to traffic the bridge known as the Bayonne Bridge, which connects Port Richmond, Staten Island, with Bayonne, in New Jersey.

Besides these projects the port authority has erected the Port of New York Authority Commerce Building, called Inland Terminal No. 1. The building was completed in 1931 and opened for operation October 3, 1932. It is a 16-story structure, occupying the block bounded by Eighth and Ninth Avenues and West Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets, New York. The basement and street floor are operated by the trunk-line railroads as a union depot for less-than-carload freight. Practically the rest of the building is rented or held for rental for offices, commercial, and industrial use.

For the year ending October 31, 1935, the Port Authority Commerce Building sustained a net loss of $384,844, according to available figures, but in 1936 the authority expects, it has announced, a net income from this building of $120,000. Gross income from the structure in 1935 was $854,000, as compared with $470,000 for 10 months of 1934. The current year should meet all expectations of the authority for putting the building on a paying basis.

The 1934 port authority figures show a deficit of $280,000 on operations of the Arthur Kill Bridge. The net operating loss for 1934 was $298,852. The gross income for 1934 was greater than the 1935 income, but the deficit is less.

The Bayonne Bridge had a slight gain over 1934, but its net operating loss approximates $170,000.

If, then, the Inland Terminal Building will operate this year without loss and net $120,000, that figure may be applied against the total deficit in the operation on the Arthur Kill and Bayonne Bridges, if any, which should not exceed deficits of $280,000 for the Arthur Kill Bridge and $170,000 for the Bayonne Bridge. Taking the $120,000 from the aggregate deficits of the bridges, the total deficit from these operations should not exceed $330,000.

Considering the paying projects of the port authority, the 1935 figures disclose gross income from the George Washington Bridge of $3,854,801.71, with a net income of $1,261,609.88. Last year's figures also show a gross income from the Holland Tunnel of $6,379,647.20, leaving a net income after deductions of $2,781,347.87. The net income from these two projects for 1935 was $4,042,957.75.

For 1935 the revenue from all its facilities netted the port authority an income of $3,346,273.16, and since the Inland Terminal No. 1 had a loss last year, which, according to estimate will show a profit this year, the 1936 figures will be even more favorable.

Its 1935 gross income from all sources reached the sum of $11,975,392.24. The figure shows a gain of $837,242.64 over 1934, of $2,000,000 over 1933, and of almost $3,000,000 over 1932. The general reserve fund as of January 1, 1936, had a balance of $3,078,505, and other reserve accounts totaled about $15,000,000.

More than 19,000,000 vehicles passed through the tunnels and over the bridges of the port authority in 1935.

Having due regard for its obligations, the Port of New York Authority can and must cut the tolls on all its crossings to the point where the businessman, the worker, and resident will have full benefit of the natural advantages of the port district.

The cost of the projects of the port authority must be considered in all of its aspects, and then only as one factor in arriving at a decision as to what constitutes reasonable tolls.

So the fixed charges for bond indebtedness is only a factor in that determination.

The theory is that reduction of tolls of itself will increase traffic, and eventually revenue, where service facilities are adequate and satisfactory.

Largely on this theory the Interstate Commerce Commission recently ordered a reduction of the basic passenger rate for the structure by railroads throughout the country to 2 cents a mile.

In practice, a reduction of railroad fares in the South and West has resulted in doubling the number of passengers carried and effecting an increase in revenue. As an example, the Southern Railway, a company which charged fares ranging from 1 cent to 2½ cents per mile, found that the lowest rate produced more revenue. September 1, 1932, the Southern Railway cut passenger rates to 1.5 cents per mile in North Carolina. The result was an increase the very first month over the corresponding month of the previous year of 223 percent in passengers and 59 percent in revenue. During the same month the company as a whole showed a decrease in revenue of 33 percent. On the reduced rate the percentages of increases in passengers and revenue continued and in August 1933 reached a point of 338-percent increase in passengers and 120 percent in revenue.

In Tennessee the experiment was equally satisfactory, and the lower rate was extended over other parts of its line with similar satisfactory results.

During 1934 there was considerable agitation, in which I took part, for the elimination of pedestrian tolls on the George Washington Bridge. Finally, on January 1, 1935, the pedestrian toll was reduced from 10 cents to 5 cents, which is now in effect. But why should the port authority exact this toll, especially on week days? The income from pedestrian tolls in 1935 was approximately $5,000. The great majority of pedestrians use the bridge on Sundays and holidays. The abolition of the pedestrian toll might not materially increase the pedestrian use of the bridge, but the worker should, in any case, have a free crossing open to him should he be afoot.

A representative of the port authority at a hearing in Washington emphasized that a bridge was constructed for either railroad or vehicular purposes and pedestrian use did not enter into consideration except incidentally.

At the same hearing the proponents of a railroad bridge to be constructed at Fifty-seventh Street over the Hudson River proposed that it would furnish, along with its railroad facilities, a pedestrian crossing for which no toll would be charged.

The Tri-Borough Bridge will soon be opened. Pedestrians may cross that span free of any toll or charge.

Let us compare the charges to be made by the Tri-Borough Bridge Authority with the tolls effective on the port authority crossings.

On the Tri-Borough Bridge, passenger automobiles, taxicabs, hearses, ambulances, and horse-drawn vehicles will pay 25 cents. On port authority crossings the same vehicles must pay 50 cents, except that horse-drawn vehicles are not permitted in its tunnel.

Other comparative tolls are:

Motorcycles: Tri-Borough toll, 15 cents; port authority toll, 25 cents.

Bicycles: Tri-Borough toll, 10 cents; port authority toll, 25 cents.

Two-axle trucks, load capacity 2 tons and under: Tri-Borough toll, 25 cents; port authority toll, 50 cents.

Two-axle trucks, load capacity over 2 tons, but not over 5 tons capacity: Tri-Borough toll, 35 cents; port authority toll, 75 cents.

Two-axle trucks, load capacity over 5 tons: Tri-Borough toll, 50 cents; port authority toll, $1.

Three-axle trucks or tractor and semitrailer: Tri-Borough toll, 60 cents; port authority toll, 75 cents to $1.25.

Four-axle trucks and trailers, or tractor and trailer: Tri-Borough toll, 75 cents; port authority toll, $1.50.

The city of Camden, N. J., is not in or under the jurisdiction of the Port of New York Authority. The Camden bridge spanning the Delaware connects that city with Philadelphia. The users of that bridge are getting the benefit of a 25-cent vehicular toll, while in the world's greatest port district a charge of 50 cents is made to cross the Hudson.

Furthermore, rail rapid transit will be shortly placed on the Camden Bridge, while nothing has been definitely proposed for the George Washington Bridge, although that bridge was originally designed and built for rapid-transit purposes.

It has been intimated that should the privately proposed railroad bridge with rapid-transit facilities be built across the Hudson at Fifty-seventh Street, any adequate plan for a publicly owned interstate transit system over the George Washington Bridge to serve northern New Jersey would be thwarted. But would rapid-transit facilities at Fifty-seventh Street more seriously compete with rapid transit at One Hundred and Seventy-eighth Street than will vehicular traffic at Thirty-eighth Street compete with vehicular traffic in the Holland Tunnel at Canal Street or the vehicular traffic at One Hundred and Seventy-eighth Street. Or would the Jenny plan of rapid transit under the lower part of the Hudson compete seriously with rapid transit across the George Washington Bridge?

To a letter of mine dated February 8 the general manager of the port authority replied on the 20th regarding rapid transit over the George Washington Bridge, writing that much more is involved than the mere suspension of the second deck and the laying of rails on the bridge itself, and that a complete system connecting at both sides of the bridge is essential to the provision of an adequate rapid-transit service for northern New Jersey.

Pursuant to a joint resolution passed in the New Jersey Legislature on February 10th, the port authority is now engaged in preparing a report on the subject.

The people of northern New Jersey have been long handicapped by the lack of rapid-transit facilities. They have been urging them, demanding them. The Port of New York Authority has responded, as I have indicated, but difficulties may arise and especially so in the essential connection of any system on the New York side of the Hudson, due to influences that frequently fail to realize that New Jersey is an integral part of the port district.

Rapid transit will come, as it is bound to come, but meanwhile and immediately the port authority can consider the reduction of the bridge and tunnel tolls. Passenger automobiles, two-axle trucks with a load capacity of 2 tons or under, taxicabs, ambulances, and horse-drawn vehicles are entitled to a toll of 25 cents. New Jersey is far more populous opposite New York than is Camden across the Delaware from Philadelphia. There is no good reason why the Hudson toll should be more than the Delaware toll for these vehicles.

The bus toll charged on the George Washington Bridge is exorbitant. It costs $1 to run a passenger bus one way across the bridge. The expense to the passenger is 10 cents. If the New Jersey area of the port is to develop, and if New York workers and residents are to have, as they should, ready and reasonable access to the New Jersey side of the district, the bridge and tunnel transportation charges must be drastically revised. Vehicular passengers ought to ride for a 5-cent fare. As long as the bus toll is $1 they cannot do so. The port authority owes it to the people of the district to act accordingly.

What is the port of New York district?

In 1921 the Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution, granted its consent to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of New York and the State of New Jersey for the creation of the port of New York district and the establishment of the Port of New York Authority for the comprehensive development of the port of New York.

The compact approved by Congress describes the district as beginning about 2.1 miles northwest of the pier at Piermont, N. Y.; thence running southwesterly to Westwood, Bergen County, N. J.; thence southwesterly west of the city of Paterson, Caldwell, Summit, and Plainfield to south of New Brunswick; thence in an easterly direction south of Mattawan crossing Monmouth County to a point in the Atlantic Ocean south of Atlantic Highlands; thence northerly across Long Island east of Jamaica, west of New Hyde Park, and east of the shore of Manhasset Bay at Port Washington, crossing Long Island Sound to the boundary line between New York and Connecticut at Portchester; thence northwesterly north of White Plains and crossing the Hudson River to the place of beginning north of Piermont.

The district has an area about 25 miles in radius and includes the city of New York and the cities of Jersey City, Newark, Hoboken, Passaic, and Paterson.

The Port of New York Authority created by the compact of the States is a body corporate and politic, an instrumentality of the States of New York and New Jersey consisting of 12 commissioners, 6 New York members chosen by the State of New York and 6 New Jersey members chosen by the State of New Jersey.

The authority is vested with power to purchase, lease, and/or operate any terminal or transportation facility within the port district; to make charges for the use thereof; and to hold, lease, and operate real and personal property; to borrow money; and to secure its loans by bonds and mortgages. It derives all its income from its tunnel, bridges, and terminal building.

Personally I have a high regard for the commissioners of the port authority. They are able men, devoted to the interests of the entire port district. But I sometimes wonder if they are not hampered in their efforts by business and community jealousies within the confines of New York. Again listen to the words of Mr. Outerbridge, former chairman of the authority: " * * * in business as in private life and between communities as between individuals that green-eyed monster called 'jealousy' springs to life and grows in intensity as the object on which it has cast its coveted eyes grows in envious importance."

It will be remembered, perhaps, that Jersey City has in recent years attracted great industries and rich investments away from the east side of the Hudson. Not long ago the New York Stock Exchange threatened to move to Jersey City or Newark. Many leading industries have established themselves in the port cities of New Jersey. Can New York interests be jealous of the New Jersey side of the port's commerce?

Well, Thomas E. Rush, former Surveyor of the Port of New York, has said:

"New York began with a desire for commerce, was seized by one nation from another because of lust for commerce, was governed and misgoverned with a view to commerce, and grew to its present stature by serving commerce."

When, in 1919, a port treaty was proposed between New York and New Jersey, Greater New York's mayor at that time was neutral, and the city's other officials were either neutral or opposed to the proposition. Some business organizations were for it; others voiced opposition.

Nevertheless, 2 years later brought the compact between the two States by which the State lines were broken down and a single unified port district established.

It is and must be treated as one unified district. Each is an essential part of the whole port area. The prosperity of all is at stake. New Yorkers are vitally affected by the business of Jersey-men and vice versa. And what happens here affects the entire Nation.

Alex. C. Humphreys, former president of Stevens Institute of Technology at Hoboken, years ago said on that score:

"Unquestionably the development of the port of New York and its proper administration not only greatly concerns the prosperity of New York City and New York State but concerns the prosperity of the Nation at large."

In February 1918, Hon. Calvin Tomkins, then dock commissioner of greater New York, in an address made in New York had this to say:

"Improved communication between the New York and New Jersey sides of the port is the crux of the port organization here, and all-rail transit by protracting the New Jersey roads over and under the Hudson River to New York and thence to New England will be the ultimate cure of our port defects, but in the interim and as a necessary step in progressive development vehicular tunnels and modern New Jersey terminals can easily be constructed and are absolutely necessary."

The question of port organization comes under two classes—one, war organization for imminent use, and the other for peacetimes. Three important things to be done are: (1) Development of a great modern terminal at Jersey City, thus utilizing motor trucks and lighterage to a greater extent; (2) construction of vehicular tunnels; (3) all-rail connections either by tunnel or bridge with Manhattan.

Of these we have only a vehicular tunnel and vehicular bridges. But what do they avail if their use is prohibitive because of excessive tolls?

It is the function of the authority to effect economies which would reduce the cost of living and doing business in the port district, and to aid in the upbuilding of its industries and commerce.

Is this being done by the authority, particularly in the northern area of New Jersey? The authority does not have the taxing power, but it has even greater power. Its revenues may, by law, be applied to the cost of construction, maintenance, and operation of its tunnel and bridge as a group, so that they as a group shall be self-sustaining.

New building operations could prolong indefinitely the high tolls charged the patrons of the paying crossings now in operation, with the result that the authority could continue to tell our businessmen, workers, and residents that they are not paying one penny of tax, and keep on doing as they are now doing—exact millions every year from the present generation.

The port authority, I am confident, will not deny the public interest. Public interest demands a reduction in tolls on all port authority interstate crossings.

ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules (on behalf of Mr. Cox), submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 461), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 461

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3424, a bill to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

FURTHER RECLAMATION IS AGAINST THE INTERESTS OF THE FARMERS, WHETHER EAST OR WEST

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a radio address delivered by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following address, which I delivered over the National Broadcasting System on Saturday, March 21, at 12:30 p. m.:

Fellow citizens, I am indebted to the National Broadcasting Co. for this opportunity of speaking to the farmers of the Nation, and to Mr. Fred Brenckman, the able representative of the National Grange in Washington, who was the bearer of the invitation.

When I first came to Congress in 1928, my attention was called to the strange procedure whereby the Federal Government was bringing additional lands into production in competition with farmers already on the land.

I knew that industry would bitterly resent such an invasion, and I believe that the true American concept of governmental function is traditionally opposed to such procedure. The country knows that the problem of the farmers yesterday and since the close of the Great War has been the problem of surplus. Congress recognized that in legislating to the end that existing surpluses might be controlled so that the farmer might get a living price for his product.

Every thinking American concurs in the proposition that the return to normal times is dependent very largely upon reestablishing the buying power of the farmer. Upon this restoration of prosperity to the farmers of the Nation depends the well-being and indeed the future life of the industrial States.

The country has witnessed under the A. A. A. the disbursement of a billion and a half dollars for the purpose of annually retiring 35,000,000 acres from production, for the avowed intent of obtaining parity prices for agriculture. The country has witnessed at the same time and in the same years the extraordinary and remarkable spectacle of the Federal Government entering upon what will amount to an ultimate disbursement of $1,500,000,000 in order to bring 4,000,000 acres into production. The history of civilization presents no conflict of policy so stupid as this.

May I state that my study of the question was not accidental or gratuitous? The farmers in my district complained to me that they were being destroyed in the New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago markets by competition from products grown on Government-reclaimed lands. I was led to make an investigation of the subject and came to the conclusion that not only were the farmers in New York State being wrecked by this fatal procedure but that the farmers in the West and the Southwest were also being driven to the wall. I learned that the National Grange and indeed every Secretary of Agriculture in recent years had opposed this weird policy. The Grange leadership has protested in thunderous tones. In the September 1928 issue of the Nation's Business, Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, made the following pertinent inquiry:

"If the steel industry, the automobile industry, or any of our other great manufacturing industries were suffering from a depression of 7 years' duration, occasioned at least in part by overproduction, what would be said if Congress should consider spending hundreds of millions of dollars for more plants for more overproduction?"

It is a matter of common knowledge that both parties of Congress reached an agreement in 1930 that no further lands would be developed until America had caught up. Shoulder to shoulder with the representatives of the farming districts in the North and Middle West, I have fought against this mistaken policy. Thus far we have fought in vain largely because the farmers and farm groups, except the Grange, have been passive.

They have been lulled into security by the familiar fiction that reclamation adds but 1 percent to the present crop production in America. My colleagues from the reclamation States have been saying this for the past 20 years. The fact is that in some fields the increased croppage rises as high as 50 percent, and the tables show that 11 percent of the total crops in America are raised on lands every acre of which has been either reclaimed by the Government or on private projects fostered and engineered by the Federal Bureau of Reclamation.

I repeat that it will cost over a billion and a half dollars to complete the present projects. Much of this money will come from the farm States, including Minnesota, Wisconsin, Kansas, and Iowa. In other words, this willful group in the Department of the Interior, which has the mad urge to make two blades of grass grow where none grew before, is using the money of the farmers for the purpose of destroying them by added competition.

May I say that I have the national viewpoint and am for a rational development of all sections of America. I sympathize with the needs and ambitions of every State, so long as they are economically sound and not destructive of preexisting rights. In fact, I specially plead today for the farmers who are already on the land in the reclaimed areas of the West. They will be the first to bear the brunt of the added croppage from these irrigated lands.

The National Grange has been for the relief of the farmers on irrigated farms. It has advocated the moratorium and other relief for water users on this type of land. I have vigorously supported such measures in the House.

Putting these 4,000,000 acres into production will further handicap the already grievous situation of the dairymen, for our friends in the Reclamation Bureau are stressing dairying in all their literature. It will destroy the California growers of soft fruit, including pears, peaches, and apricots. It will destroy the Oregon and Idaho farmers by new plantings of apples and potatoes. It will furnish additional and destructive competition to the fruit growers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, the New England States, Ohio, Michigan, and southern Illinois. Putting these lands into production will seriously affect the present difficult situation of the wheat and corn farmers in Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, and the Dakotas.

Every foot of land reclaimed reduces the value of the existing farm acreage. One real dirt farmer from the State of Washington writes me:

"The placing of more lands under irrigation at this time is nothing short of confiscation of the homes and ranches of those people who have already invested their life savings in this State."

The projects now under construction are 41 in number. One of them involves tunneling under the Rocky Mountains; another, turning back the waters of the ocean, after the fashion of King Canute. Many of them are equally fantastic. Here are some of them, with the cost:

Gila project, Arizona.....	$48,000,000
Central Valley project, California.....	170,000,000
Carlsbad project, New Mexico.....	4,500,000
Deschutes project, Oregon.....	2,000,000
Yakima project, Washington.....	14,466,600
Provo River project, Utah.....	10,000,000
Casper-Alcova project, Wyoming.....	27,000,000
Riverton project, Wyoming.....	15,000,000
Shoshone project, Wyoming.....	11,500,000
Grand Coulee project, Washington.....	490,000,000

These projects, with others that I do not have time to enumerate, will bring 4,000,000 additional acres into production at a cost to the Federal Treasury of a billion and a half dollars. It means that the Bureau of Reclamation does not intend that the farmers of the Nation shall catch up. It means that crop surpluses, like Tennyson's brook, will go on forever. The cure for this destructive economic evil is simple.

Public opinion vigorously expressed is still the most powerful influence in America. Let the farmers of the Nation demand that the Bureau of Reclamation be put in the Department of Agriculture where it belongs. I urge them to take action by grange resolution or otherwise asking Congress to so legislate.

Let the farmers—North, East, South, and West—get into action and serve notice on Congress that this business of destroying them through the medium of Government reclaimed lands must cease, until America, by reason of increased population or increased export trade, no longer has agricultural overproduction.

LETTER TO H. P. DROUGHT, TEXAS STATE ADMINISTRATOR OF W. P. A.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to extend my remarks, and, with the consent of my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a short letter which our colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] has written to Mr. Drought, the State administrator of W. P. A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there are 21 Representatives in Congress from the State of Texas. Every one of them have been shamefully treated by Harry P. Drought, State administrator for the Works Progress Administration in Texas. In order to prevent the Texas Representatives from making any appointments in their respective districts, Harry Drought designedly, purposely, deliberately, and arbitrarily divided Texas up into 20 mongrel districts, specially framed so that part of each Member's district would be embraced within several of Drought's 20 arbitrary districts.

For instance, you will find some of my counties in Harry Drought's seventh district, some in his eighth district, and some in his thirteenth district, all three with headquarters in different places, some far removed from my district.

When any official from one of my counties writes or wires me about some W. P. A. project it is necessary for my office first to check up with Harry Drought's arbitrary map to ascertain in which of his mongrel arbitrary districts he has seen fit to place that county, so as to find out where the headquarters office is that handles the project business of that county.

If Harry Drought had wanted to be fair with Texas Representatives, and had not intended to commit a fraud upon them, he would have handled Texas by accepting its already well defined 21 congressional districts, and would not have arbitrarily cut up these 21 districts into 20 arbitrary districts of his own.

Not a Texas Member has a kind feeling for Harry Drought. Not a Texas Member has any use for him. The letter which my colleague from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] wrote to Harry Drought so well expresses the sentiments in the hearts of all Texas Members that I thought it should go into the RECORD. It is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1936.

Mr. H. P. DROUGHT,
State Administrator, Works Progress Administration,
Smith-Young Tower, San Antonio, Tex.

DEAR SIR: Yours of March 18, with enclosures, received today.

As you paid no attention to me or my views or wishes up to this time while you were putting people on, there is no need to inform me (or any other Texas Congressman) of the worries and complaints you anticipate, now that you are to let workers off the rolls.

My task will be simple if any who are to be let off complain to me. I shall merely inform them that the 21 congressional districts were so ignored that no Congressman would be consulted in putting men on, in order to throw all patronage to the Senators, while the people held the Congressmen responsible; that, as part of the conspiracy, therefore, you paid no respect to my recommendations nor did you consult me, but handled it exactly as you pleased; that, therefore, I am not responsible for any detail of your administration, and hence have no power to aid any discharged worker.

And all of the above are the plain facts.

You need not bother to take any of your matters up with me. You "high hatted" the people's Representatives from the very beginning till now. You would not play politics, you said; and, of course, it is not politics for you to allow Senators to suggest persons you appointed, but it is, of course, politics if you had honored the recommendation of the Congressmen. So you took over, body and breeches, the old political senatorial P. W. A. organization and used it for your latest work of W. P. A. No politics at all.

Just go ahead and "pull your own chestnuts out of the fire"; don't try to lay, as you do in yours of 18th, with enclosures, predicate to expect us to be "suckers" enough now to pull them out for you.

When the going was easy for you, you did not then notice me. Now, when your political going is getting hard, you need not now notice me.

Yours truly,

JOE H. EAGLE.

LONG- AND SHORT-HAUL RATES

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3263) to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3263, with Mr. WILCOX in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act is a long subject and 20 minutes is a short time, and I shall therefore have to beg to be permitted to proceed without interruption.

At the outset I feel I would be less than frank with the Members of the Committee who are interested in this proposed legislation if I did not make some mention of my ties and sympathies with the railway employees of this country.

I come of a railroad family, men in the ranks. My father, at the close of the Civil War, became a railroad construction worker in the West. My next brother, a locomotive engineer, died at his throttle in a collision. My youngest brother is still a locomotive engineer in the service; and, as the gentleman from Ohio, my friend, Mr. COOPER, stated to you the other day in debate, I once occupied a position in the cab of a locomotive, but unlike my friend COOPER, I did not attain the exalted station on the right-hand side, as we call it. I was that humble and murky individual down on the deck who produced the power, or, as we used to say in the vernacular of the railroad, furnished the fog, and I put in 4 years at it, and 4 years in even humbler capacities, including a year on the section at $1.10 per day. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] talked about his 4 long years waiting to become an engineer. I put in 4 long years with a scoop shovel on the deck of a locomotive, and then my railroad career was terminated at that fateful time known to old-timers as '94, but, as Kipling said, that is another story.

When I came to the Sixty-first Congress I was the first member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen ever elected to a seat in this body, and, so far as I know, while I was out many years, I believe that is still the case.

I was glad, Mr. Chairman and Members, that as the hearing progressed on this bill I found I could go along with the railroad men of this country on the merits of this legislation. [Applause.] And make no mistake about one thing, the railway men of America are a unit for the Pettengill bill.

Four spokesmen for the 21 standard railway organizations appeared before our committee in behalf of the bill. They consumed only 1 hour, but it was a stirring hour. If that hour by those four men could be put on in this House, it would make more votes for this legislation than everything that will be said here.

They have seen their members dwindle from around 2,000,000 to 1,000,000 men in the last 15 years. They are now faced with the economies being forced on the railroads of the country which may decrease their number 150,000 to 200,000 more.

The railway men of America, the high-grade railway men of America, are fast disappearing from the American transportation picture. They have their backs to the wall, and that is why they are for this bill. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the hearings on this bill consumed over 3 weeks and produced more than a thousand pages of testimony. I was present at every hearing and heard every witness. I was an attentive listener for two reasons: First, all I did not know about the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act would make a very big book, and all I do not know yet would be a valuable mass of information.

I feel no embarrassment in making such a statement when high operating railway officials before the committee were quick in saying: "I am not a rate expert. Do not ask me about rates. You will have to ask the tariff rate experts who make rates under the fourth section."

Rate making under the fourth section has entered into the realm of high mathematics, and as one brilliant witness said, it has become crystallized and so complex that this witness, for 20 years a traffic expert and 10 years an attorney for the Interstate Commerce Commission, said that there were tariff schedules worked out under the fourth section that even members of the Commission could not apply, and that when the operating officials and shippers got the schedules they were not able to determine what the new rates were or ought to be.

THE LAW'S DELAY

No consideration of section 4 would be complete without some reference to the enormous difficulties and delays involved in fourth section relief. All the rail carriers and the traffic bodies who appeared for the Pettengill bill complained of the complexities involved and the delays suffered by the carriers and shippers, applications often being so protracted that the relief was of little value when finally granted. From 1 and 2 years to a period of years is often consumed in disposing of applications. A witness, Mr. F. C. Hillyer, representing the Jacksonville (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce, and traffic bodies in Florida, who was for 11 years an examining attorney in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a career man in interstate-commerce practice, summarized it when he said:

The administration of this law (fourth section) has become so complex that it is literally past the understanding of the average man.

He said:

A recent large agency tariff of rates between the Ohio River and southeastern points contained about 7 pages of rates and about 150 pages of routings and routing restrictions.

He shows that the system has become frozen, crystallized, not only hampering rail transportation but sometimes driving shippers to other forms of transportation not so burdened. The testimony of other witnesses is replete with such statements and complaints. Rate making under the fourth section appears to have become a complex science in which the ends seem to be swallowed up in the means. A reading of Mr. Hillyer's statement, beginning on page 386 of the hearings, is very informative.

Mr. Chairman, another reason why I was a very attentive listener on these sessions of the committee is that I come not only from out where the West begins but out where the intermountain country begins, and where the long and short haul begins to be more controversial, as shown by reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, than in any other section of the country.

It is a hot spot, and some Members from that area have said that the long and short haul is loaded with dynamite or suicide out in our country. Naturally, a man who has to choose between suicide and being dynamited would be interested in any proposed legislation relating thereto. [Laughter.]

Starting the hearings in a rather critical—I might say, opposing—attitude, I came out at the end of the hearings with the conclusion that the railway companies of America not only greatly need this legislation, but that if section 4 were not now in the Interstate Commerce Act there would be no proposal whatever to put it in. That is the change that has occurred in the transportation world in this country in the last 15 or 20 years.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman yielding to questions?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am not yielding; I am sorry. Already I have used half of my time and not said anything. I had arranged an orderly presentation of this subject, beginning with the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act, but which time forbids, and which I propose to put into the RECORD at this point, and I recommend that Members read it—the first matter I am passing over being the history of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, and the next an analysis of pending bills, which features I believe you will find clearly, briefly, and informatively treated.

HISTORY OF SECTION 4 OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

The Interstate Commerce Act, enacted in 1887, grew out of the necessity of regulating railway rates and practices. At that time, according to various statements of the Interstate Commerce Commission, discriminations against individuals, classes of business, and communities in favor of other individuals, classes of business, and communities were rife all over the country. The railways had a monopoly of transportation. It was the heyday of railway rule. It became necessary to place railway operations under Federal regulation, and the result was the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887.

From the beginning the chief regulatory provisions of the act as it affects rates and practices in the transportation of freight and passengers has been section 4. That section, now on the statute books for 48 years, has been but twice amended—once in 1910 and again in 1920.

The most controversial feature of section 4 is the long- and short-haul clause. Briefly this means that a carrier shall not charge more for a short than a long haul. Throughout the history of the act this clause has been changed only once, and that in but a few words, but this change was fraught with far-reaching consequences in the interpretation and administration of the law and the effect upon rate charges and structures.

ORIGINAL LONG- AND SHORT-HAUL CLAUSE

As originally enacted in 1887, the long- and short-haul clause reads:

It shall be unlawful for any common carriers * * * to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions—

Note these words:

under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

With power in the Commission to afford relief in specific cases.

This clause remained in effect for 23 years; that is, from 1887 to 1910. The principal change wrought in 1910 was the elimination of the phrase "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

The reason for the elimination of this phrase was that the carriers construed it to authorize a greater charge for a short haul than a long haul under dissimilar circumstances and conditions, and the circumstances and conditions were usually considered by the carriers to be dissimilar. This construction by the carriers is claimed by the opponents of the pending legislation to have been responsible for the great mass of discriminations in freight charges at intermediate points throughout the country, and particularly in the western or intermountain country, which region has always been, and still is, the chief field of opposition to any change in section 4 of the act.

The Interstate Commerce Commission overruled the construction placed by the carriers on this phrase, but the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the carriers, and the result was the practical nullification of the long- and short-haul clause as originally enacted in 1887. This resulted in the first amendment to the act, that of 1910, in which this phrase was eliminated.

THE CHANGES OF 1920

In addition to the almost unlimited leeway in the fixing of rates given the carriers by the phrase, the act prior to 1910 had not been construed to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates. It may be said, therefore, that prior to 1910 there was little railroad rate legislation in the highly restricted sense we have had since 1910. In 1920 the second and last changes were made in section 4, by the addition of three more rules, which may be stated as follows:

First. The through rate must be reasonably compensatory.

Second. The equidistant rule, governing intermediate rates on circuitous competing lines.

Third. Forbidding of rate reductions to rail carriers to meet potential water competition.

I shall not undertake any lengthy explanation of the reasonably compensatory clause and the equidistant rule. It would be pretending a knowledge of something that I do not understand and is wholly beyond my ability to comprehend. These two rules belong in the realm of higher mathematics. Even the most experienced railway operating officials admit that they are not qualified to discuss the intricacies and operation of these rules. These are matters for the technicians of the trade.

A complicated formula has been worked out of the compensatory clause after years of experimentation, but so many elements enter into it that it has been a constant subject of dispute and difficulty between the Commission, the carriers, and the shippers.

And, after 15 years, the Coordinator, in House Document 89, Seventy-fourth Congress, says:

The controversy as to the meaning of the words "reasonably compensatory" still continues.

Competent rate experts having no connection with the railways claim that the Commission has power under other sections of the act and particularly section 15, which empowers the Commission to fix both minimum and maximum rates, to fix a reasonably compensatory rate as nearly as may be.

The equidistant rule, fixing rates at the intermediate points on circuitous routes which compete with direct routes, is so complex that in many cases neither operating officials nor shippers can interpret or apply them or determine what the rate is. Cases are known in which 5 or 6 pages of rates require 150 pages of routings, involving great delay and expense in the preparation. A witness before the committee who had been for 10 years an attorney in the Interstate Commerce Commission made the statement to our committee that there were equidistant schedules which even members of the Commission could not apply.

The rule against granting the rail carriers relief against potential water competition is simple. It works out in this way: Before the water competition begins it is too early to grant relief; after it begins it is too late. This is a brief but fair statement of the operation of the rule.

A case in point was certain railroad tonnage from St. Louis to Cincinnati. It was proposed to put in a competing water service to bid for this tonnage. The rail carriers applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for fourth-section relief. Fourth-section relief means that the carrier be permitted to reduce its rates to the competitive point, without a corresponding reduction in rates to intermediate points.

In the St. Louis to Cincinnati case, the application was held premature and fourth-section relief was denied, thereafter the water competition was established, and after it had taken about one-third of the rail tonnage the rail carriers again applied for fourth-section relief, but this was denied them on the grounds that vested rights in the competing service had supervened and that recovery of the lost tonnage was speculative anyhow.

ANALYSIS OF PENDING BILLS

There are several bills pending for the amendment of section 4, but the two principal bills are H. R. 3263 by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] and H. R. 5362 by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], known as the Eastman bill.

The Pettengill bill is very brief. It is in fact one clause of the existing section 4, to wit:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier * * * to charge or receive any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates;

With a proviso added in committee that the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to justify a lower rate for a long than for a short haul against any claim of violation of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 1 requires all rail rates to be just and reasonable.

Section 2 forbids unjust discrimination in rail rates.

Section 3 forbids undue preferences and prejudices in rail rates.

In addition, section 15 confers upon the Commission the power to prescribe maximum and minimum rates and the power to suspend rates. All these powers are unaffected by the Pettengill bill.

It may be stated at this point that Coordinator Eastman, who is opposed to the bill, stated before the Rules Committee that the Commission could still exercise all the powers of rate regulation under the bill that it may exercise under the existing law; but he expressed the view that the repeal by Congress of the long- and short-haul clause would be regarded by the courts as an expression of intent—that Congress must have intended something by the change. Congress, of course, would intend something; it would intend to relieve the rail carriers of a drastic, outworn restriction, which ties not only the hands of the carriers but the hands of the Commission, and places the carriers at the mercy of great new and favored forms of competing transportation.

The Rayburn bill is the reenactment of the present long- and short-haul clause of section 4 as amended in 1910. The Rayburn bill simply drops out the additions of 1920—that is, the reasonably compensatory clause, the equidistant rule governing circuitous routes, and the potential water-competition clause.

It was my conclusion, reached as the result of exhaustive hearings, to which I gave most diligent attention and with my mind open to the evidence, that merely the dropping of the amendments of 1920 would not reach the seat of the trouble and would not furnish sufficient relief in a field where relief is greatly needed.

Upon one point I am clear—that is, upon the need of substantial relief for the rail carriers of the country unless the country wants to have on its hands some fine day about $20,000,000,000 worth of bankrupt railroads, one-fourth of them now in receiverships, and which are and must continue to be the country's principal, most dependable, and by far the most valuable transportation structure and wholly indispensable to the national defense.

ANCIENT PRACTICES AND ABUSES

Mr. Chairman, if I could contribute but one thought to this controversy, it would be this, and I want you to keep it in mind throughout the debate: It is that until 1910 there was virtually no rate regulation, that the railroads had a complete monopoly of all inland transportation, that the railroads had not submitted and become habituated to Government control, and that the railroads were then a political power in the State and Federal Governments. That picture has not merely changed; it has passed completely away.

So far as regulation is concerned, the change was briefly but completely summarized during the consideration of the holding company bill last year by the Christian Science Monitor, when it stated editorially that—

The holding companies are now in the status once occupied by the railroads, which have now become the most drastically regulated activity in the United States. There is nothing in the shape of public regulation comparable with it. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the oldest and strongest Government regulatory body.

That the change in the field of transportation, which is of much greater importance to the railroads, has been even greater than in the field of regulation I will shortly undertake to show.

In the hearings almost without exception the opponents of the bill went back to a time when the railways enjoyed an almost complete monopoly of transportation, were unregulated, and were as well a political power in the country. I remarked several times to witnesses during the course of the hearings, and I repeat it here, that I considered precedents of more than 15 years' standing regarding railroad conditions, practices, and abuses, and certainly precedents antedating the World War, as of very little value in shedding light on the solution of this problem.

I find corroboration of this view in the following paragraph from the report of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, Senate Document No. 152, Seventy-third Congress, second session:

The past 15 years have been a period of great change, development, and adjustment in transportation, not only in this country but all over the world. There has been an extraordinary growth in the use of other means of transporting persons and property as a substitute for railroad transportation. Two of these means were new—the highway motor vehicle and the airplane—one, the pipe line, has been in use for many years, but experienced a sudden and rapid new development; another, carriage by water, is one of the oldest forms of transportation, but has recently gained a relative importance in this country, principally through the opening of the Panama Canal and the improvement of inland waterways. The electric transmission line transports only energy but it tends to reduce the transportation by the railroads of stored energy in the form of coal.

As an example of the nature of much of the opposition to the bill, one witness read at length from a decision rendered by Judge Thomas Cooley, one of the first Interstate Commerce Commissioners, in 1887. It was a very able opinion as to the original need for the act. After some 10 or 15 minutes I asked the witness, "Are you still reading from Judge Cooley's decision of 1887?" Since 1887 and very long after 1887 a great change has occurred in the transportation picture as it affects the railroads. With many of the railroads in bankruptcy and indebted to the Government for a half billion dollars; with a capital investment of less than $200,000,000 in shipping taking practically all of the intercoastal traffic through the Panama Canal from a rail-carrier investment of more than $20,000,000,000; with a decline in gross rail receipts from six-billion-odd in 1929 to three-billion-odd in 1934; with a decline in working personnel during the last decade from 2,000,000 to 1,000,000 men; beset on both land and water and in the air by formidable, growing, and largely unregulated forms of competition, as summarized by Mr. Eastman, which have to furnish nothing in the field of transportation except the vehicles for moving traffic, the situation as presented is vastly different and is a matter of grave concern, not only to the carriers and their employees but to the country.

On the financial condition of the railroads the following very significant sentence is quoted from the report of the Coordinator to the Seventy-fourth Congress, House Document No. 89, page 35:

Only a few railroads are paying dividends, and more than a billion and a half in bonds are in default.

LAND GRANTS AND OLD ABUSES

Many times during the hearings opponents of the Pettengill bill mentioned the large railroad land grants as in the nature of important subsidies to the railroads. Going back 60 and 70 years for an argument against the railroads. It is true that when the transcontinental lines were built they were given large grants of the public domain, but there is not wanting evidence that they have paid well for this early-day aid. Most of these grants have long since been disposed of, and perhaps much of what is left is largely a tax burden. That cookie has been eaten. On the other hand, the land-grant roads are required to haul Government traffic at 50 percent of normal rates. This must have worked an immense saving to the Government during the war. So when the account is all cast up, they are in the status of having been made a loan 60 or 70 years ago upon which they must pay interest forever. The loan is gone and nothing but the debt remains.

I do not believe that the land grants are any helpful item in the solution of the present railroad problem. One might as well hark back to the good old days when every big railroad had a State government or two among its assets and sent its lawyers to the United States Senate and placed them on Federal benches, and subsidized public officials and newspapers and shippers with railroad passes and built up favored shippers with rebates, and that sort of thing. In the language of a comic strip, "Them days is gone forever." It is clear to my mind that testimony, a large part of which is a rehash of ancient history, is of little value in determining what ought to be done now about section 4.

DEVELOPMENT OF COMPETITION IN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Chairman, attention has been called to the fact that there was little effective railroad rate regulation prior to the amendment of 1910. I will now call attention to the conditions which prevented the tightening up of the long-and-short-haul clause in 1910 from becoming burdensome for some years thereafter to the rail carriers. To begin with, when the phrase, "Under substantially similar circumstances and conditions", was stricken from the long-and-short-haul clause in 1910, the rail carriers were permitted to file blanket applications with the Interstate Commerce Commission which retained in effect the then existing rate structures until such time as they might be changed by order of the Commission.

Roughly speaking, these changes were spread out over a period of years. At that time the Panama Canal had not been completed, and intercoastal traffic was chiefly by transshipment via the Panama Railroad and the Tehauntepec Railroad. These combined rail and water intercoastal rates were necessarily more expensive than the later all-water route through the Panama Canal, and offered less competition to the rails.

The story and causes of the decline of the railways begin not with the opening of the Panama Canal but with the ending of the European war traffic. The Panama Canal was completed and opened for traffic in 1914, coincident with the outbreak of the World War in Europe. The demands of the World War furnished shipping a more profitable field than the intercoastal traffic through the Panama Canal, with the result that American shipping deserted the intercoastal traffic in a body and the railroads had practically no intercoastal water competition until after the World War, or about 1920.

With the withdrawal of Panama Canal competition and its diversion to Atlantic traffic, leaving the rail carriers an intercoastal monopoly, the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1917 withdrew the lower transcontinental rates which had been permitted the rail carriers to meet water competition. It is claimed by the rail carriers that at the time of this withdrawal of low rail rates the Interstate Commerce Commission indicated that if and when water competition was resumed, the rail carriers would be permitted to make application for restoration of the lower rates, but that when such application was made it was denied, and they have never since been permitted to compete on the former footing with traffic through the Panama Canal.

Now, beginning about 1921 the shipping which has been deflected from the Panama Canal to the Atlantic service began returning, with numbers augmented by ships which the United States Shipping Board was selling for a song, and the shipping lines were fighting each other as well as the railroads for intercoastal traffic.

Now, here is what has turned out to be a curious thing: The rail carriers had the field virtually to themselves during the war period, and this resulted in the still further tightening up of the fourth section by Congress in 1920 by the three additional restrictions already mentioned, but at the same time there began the change in the transportation picture which I have already mentioned, which has now brought about a situation which, had it existed in 1887, makes it very doubtful whether section 4 would ever have been enacted, and which raises a real question whether it could not be repealed in toto without a recurrence of former objectionable practices on the part of the rail carriers.

This is what has happened in intercoastal traffic since 1920. Panama Canal shipping in 1922 hauled 2,000,000 tons of intercoastal traffic; in 1929 it had increased to 8,000,000 tons; and in 1934 it was 6,000,000 tons, the slump being due to the effects of the depression. This, however, leaves an increase of 300 percent in Canal traffic after the war interim. During the same period the transcontinental rail traffic declined 50 percent. In other words, while the water carriers went up three times the rail carriers fell back one-half, although both of them drew the same kind of traffic from the same sources and the traffic of each must have suffered about equally from the depression. There was only one source for the increase in the water traffic and this was at the expense of the rail carriers. As one of the representatives of the water carriers stated to the committee, "We virtually have all of the intercoastal traffic now, the railroads are out of it." In one breath the representatives of the water carriers claim that the effect of the Pettengill bill would be to wipe them from the water, and in the next breath that the rail carriers cannot meet their competition. Both of these propositions cannot be true, and I believe the testimony established the fact that the rail carriers cannot go down to water rates and would not attempt to do so even if section 4 were repealed. They have a working arrangement now on the Pacific coast, sanctioned by the Interstate Commerce Commission, whereby the north and south rail rates are maintained at 10 percent above water rates, yet notwithstanding this arrangement water carriers have 90 percent of the Pacific coast traffic of California, Oregon, and Washington. This indicates how much cheaper they are able to carry the traffic.

Right on that point let me say that the representatives of the California citrus growers appeared before our committee, one a large organization from Los Angeles and the other from Sacramento. They said that 12 to 15 years ago their traffic amounted to only 15 percent of the transcontinental traffic of the railroad companies, but that it is now 50 percent, due to the loss of other classes of rail traffic to the Panama Canal shipping, so the burden grows constantly heavier all the time on the citrus-fruit growers to keep up the railroads, and the reason they are for the Pettengill bill is that the railroad companies may again build up other lines of traffic and get some other source of revenue besides the citrus fruit of California to support the transcontinental railroads.

Another danger that faces the railroads is that they are starting refrigerator ships through the Panama Canal, and if this relief is not granted the railroads, the first thing we know, they will lose all of the transcontinental freight traffic from the Pacific coast.

COMPARATIVE ECONOMIC VALUES OF RAIL AND WATER AGENCIES

Rail transportation is, of course, preferred. It is the quicker and better service. It can maintain a differential and still get some share of the business. It is, however, much the more expensive form of transportation to maintain. It was testified before the committee that it takes two men per ton to handle rail freight as against one man per ton to handle water freight. It was also testified that rail wages are about double water wages. Added together, this makes a 4-to-1 difference in favor of water transportation in the matter of operating costs. It was also testified before the committee by a representative of the water carriers that the lines he represented handled 70 percent of the Panama Canal traffic and that the capital investment of all of these lines was only between one and two hundred millions of dollars, or about the value of one jerkwater railway.

ECONOMIC VALUE OF THE TWO SYSTEMS

I will give an illustration from the hearings of the respective economic values of these two systems. A representative of the water lines presented a map illustrating the two competing forms of transportation. A black line meandered from New York to San Francisco, representing a transcontinental line. At short intervals black cross marks represented important points and terminals. To represent the water carriers there was a black line from New York to San Francisco through the Panama Canal. I said, "Let me have that map and I will show you how it looks to me. Here is New York City, the point of origin of the transcontinental rail line. It has an enormous and expensive terminal station and facilities. There may be 100 miles or more of terminal trackage, shops, and roundhouses. At all of these intersection marks an expensive terminal plant and equipment is repeated. The road spends money with every roll of the wheels across the country. It has the highest paid labor in America. As you go West it is the main support of many American towns. It passes through counties where its annual taxes exceed its total gross revenue from the county. When it reaches San Francisco it has another great terminal. Now here is your water line. From the time it leaves the dock in New York until it reaches the dock in San Francisco it touches nothing and is worth practically nothing. It is manned with grossly underpaid labor. One-half or more of the crews are foreign. Nature has furnished it with a free highway. Congress furnishes it with free harbors, and all it needs is a boat and a dock to tie up to.

It is small wonder they can underbid the railroads for traffic. It is cheap transportation, and that is about all that can be said for it. I cannot see where the waterways enter the picture as parties in interest in this legislation, or where they can be driven out of the transportation picture by the rail carriers. Such a claim is nonsense. This is almost wholly a fight between competing points and intermediate points on the same line of railway, between the long- and the short-haul rate as it affects intermediate points.

COMPETING MOTOR TRANSPORTATION

It is in part the same story with motor competition. The public furnishes the highways. Motor transportation has no responsibility in furnishing or maintaining its highways. It does not have to go out and condemn rights-of-way and spend hundreds of millions of dollars to build tracks to run on, and continually maintain and rebuild them. The highways were there even before the trucks were built. If they had to build up ways and means as the rail carriers have had to do, there would be no motor transportation.

A representative of motor transportation said there were 3,000,000 trucks in daily use in the United States. When I read of a 2-ton truck carrying a 9-ton load I can well assume an average of 3 or 4 tons per truck per day, indicating the trucks of the country carry ten to fifteen million tons of freight per day. Some of the rail representatives stated that motor transportation is much more formidable competition to the railroads than the water carriers, yet all that is needed to engage in motor transportation is a down payment and a license.

It is not to be inferred from this that I am in favor of putting the waterways or highways out of business or crippling them, but I am in favor of keeping the rail carriers in business on something like equal terms.

Enactment of waterway and highway bills, placing them under the Interstate Commerce Commission, will not greatly relieve the railway situation. These measures carry no comparable rate regulation, no long- and short-haul clause, and can carry none. The railways would much prefer such alleged regulation even to the Pettengill bill.

PRODUCERS VERSUS CONSUMERS

The intermountain territory has been and still is the chief zone of controversy over section 4. In times past the sentiment for preserving the section "as is" has been highly predominant. So far as the jobbing interests are concerned that appears to be still the case, although there were representatives of chambers of commerce and traffic associations from practically all the Western States in favor of the Pettengill bill.

At the hearings a division of interests developed in that area and that division I may call "producers versus consumers". The producers made it fairly clear that if the railroads could be relieved of the restrictions of the long- and short-haul clause they would be enabled to reduce their through rates to competitive points without an increase in intermediate rates, and thereby expand the market area of their products.

I will take two examples, and, although they are local to my section of the country, their application is general. In my home city, Pueblo, Colo., there is located the steel plant of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. This is the largest steel plant west of Illinois. It is a thoroughly modern, electrified plant. Its rail carrier applied for fourth-section relief to enable the steel plant to meet water competition from the eastern mills at Houston, Tex., and in anticipation of the business the steel company erected a warehouse at Houston. Fourth-section relief was denied the carrier, that is, they were refused permission to lower the through rate from Pueblo to Houston while maintaining the intermediate rates. The steel company had to abandon its warehouse and withdraw its frontier into northern Texas to get sufficiently far away from the back-haul competition created by the cheaper water rates to Houston.

The rate on sugar from Colorado factories to Chicago was 56 cents per hundred pounds. It could not compete with Philippine sugar brought to San Francisco in the raw state, refined in San Francisco, and transshipped through the Panama Canal, and then via the Gulf of Mexico and Mississippi River or the Atlantic and the Lakes, to Chicago. The carriers, after application pending for 2 years, got fourth-section relief to the extent of 20 cents per hundred pounds; that is, a reduction from 56 to 36 cents. It was of some benefit to the sugar producers in reaching the Chicago market, and they claim that a further reduction of only 4 cents would have greatly enlarged the sugar business of Colorado as against Philippine sugar. However, the water rate to St. Louis was reduced to 25½ cents, and it was hauled from San Francisco to St. Louis by water as low as 18½ cents per hundred. The Government, through the Inland Waterways Corporation, owns and operates a Mississippi barge line which is engaged in this cheap water transportation. Notwithstanding all the advantages of a Government-owned activity, it has been operating at a loss. In 1934 the loss was in the neighborhood of a million dollars. That is what the railways and inland production have to buck.

Now, here is the point for the Mountain States region to determine: If it comes down to a question between producers and consumers, which interest is of the greater value? One answer is that no western State consumes its own products. They are all excess producers, and greatly excess, and in every line—coal, lumber, steel, minerals, sugar, potatoes, beans, cattle, sheep, hay, fruit, vegetables—in fact, I cannot think of a product which is not in the class of excess production. In the hearings I learned to perceive and distinguish between these interests as they were involved in this controversy. I think that it is a fair statement from the record to say that the great majority of the producers and a fair division of the commercial interests, even in the Mountain States, now favor the Pettengill bill. In my home State I took a poll by mail while the hearings were in progress, limiting the inquiry to mills, mines, factories, and commercial bodies. The returns were 74 for and 16 against the Pettengill bill. This shows a marked change of sentiment over former years.

This list for the bill contains the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the coal operators, the sugar factories, the beet and cattle growers' associations, and so on down to smaller units. I ask leave to insert the two lists in the RECORD at this point. It follows:

COLORADO—FOR PETTENGILL BILL

National Sugar Manufacturing Co., Sugar City; Great Western Sugar Co., Denver; Holly Sugar Corporation, Colorado Springs; White House Grocery, Ordway; Kropf Bros. Mercantile Co., Ordway; Chamber of Commerce, Las Animas; Chamber of Commerce, Rocky Ford; Diamond Fire Brick Co., Canon City; G. R. Lewis Drug Co., Colorado Springs; Golden Cycle Corporation, Colorado Springs; Williams & Messer Lumber Co., Trinidad; William Isabell Co. (shippers, etc.), Canon City; Union Ice & Fuel Co., Colorado Springs; Strang Garage Co., Colorado Springs; J. C. St. John Plumbing Co., Colorado Springs; Lowell-Meservey Hardware Co., Colorado Springs; Chamber of Commerce, Walsenburg; Quilitch Implement & Vehicle Co., Trinidad; Sinton Dairy Co., Colorado Springs; Collier Lumber Co., Colorado Springs; Crissey-Fowler Lumber Co., Colorado Springs; Walsenburg Creamery, Walsenburg; Arkansas Valley Stock Feeders' Association, Rocky Ford; Green & Babcock (lumber, coal), Rocky Ford; Union Lumber Co., Trinidad; Bancroft-Marty Feed & Produce Co., Trinidad; Wandell & Lowe Transfer Co., Colorado Springs; Trinidad Oil Co., Trinidad; Walsenburg Coal Co., Walsenburg; Paul A. Douden & Co., Denver; Stauder & Sargent (feeders), Fowler; C. M. Miller Co. (growers, shippers), Rocky Ford; the Forbush Co., Pueblo; the Arapahoe Shop, Pueblo; Manufacturers Bureau of Denver, Inc., Denver; American National Livestock Association, Denver; M. L. Stubbs Mercantile Co., Fowler; Burch Warehouse & Transfer Co., Pueblo; Arthur & Allen (contractors), Pueblo; Fountain Sand & Gravel Co., Pueblo; F. B. Orman Construction Co., Pueblo; Temple Fuel Co., Trinidad; Chamber of Commerce, Colorado Springs; Philip Schneider Brewing Co., Trinidad; McAnally & Channel Furniture Co., Trinidad; the Dern Co. (coffee), Colorado Springs; Baxter Hardware & Trading Co., Walsenburg; Stevenson Produce Co., Colorado Springs; Brown Commission Co., Colorado Springs; Pikes Peak Fuel Co., Colorado Springs; Couey Storage & Transfer, Trinidad; Powerine Co., Denver; Kirkpatrick's Coca-Cola Bottling Works, Walsenburg; Strain Bros. (fuel and feed), Lamar; Chamber of Commerce, La Junta; Mountain Ice & Coal Co., Pueblo; White & Davis, Pueblo; Colorado & New Mexico Coal Operators Association, Denver; Calkins-White, Pueblo; Chamber of Commerce, Greeley; Lamar Alfalfa Milling Co., Lamar; National Beet Growers Association, Greeley; Southern Colorado Beet Growers Association, Crowley; Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver; Trinidad IGA Stores, Trinidad; Ideal Cash Grocery, Trinidad; Weeden Grocery, Trinidad; Central Market, Trinidad; Newton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., Colorado Springs; Peerless Furniture Co., Colorado Springs; Chamber of Commerce, Fort Collins; Rocky Mountain Bean Dealers Association, Denver; Pueblo Trades and Labor Assembly, Pueblo; Denver Trades and Labor Assembly, Denver.

COLORADO—AGAINST PETTENGILL BILL

Bear Canon Coal Co., Trinidad; Trinidad Brick & Tile Co., Trinidad; Clay Products, Inc., La Junta; Krille-Nichols Wool & Hide Co., Pueblo; Chamber of Commerce, Pueblo; Holmes Hardware Co., Pueblo; Ady & Crowe Mercantile Co., Denver; Chamber of Commerce, Lamar; Jackson Chevrolet Co., Pueblo; Walker Motor Co., Pueblo; National Broom Manufacturing Co., Pueblo; Hendrie & Bolthoff Manufacturing Co., Denver; Newton Lumber Co., Pueblo; Robinson Grain Co., Colorado Springs; Denver Alfalfa Milling & Products Co., Lamar; Chamber of Commerce, Grand Junction.

Among those appearing for the bill was the representative of large lumber interests of the State of Washington, the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, and others, and when surprise was expressed that such a commodity so adapted to cheap water shipment, and adjacent to water, should appear in behalf of railroad transportation, they indicated that lumber must have something more than cheap transportation; that it must have markets and consumers; and that the railroads had once been their best customers, taking 25 percent of the output. The implications of the statement of the lumberman are well worth considering. In the quest for cheap transportation we may lose sight of other valuable factors. If a transportation agency worth less than $200,000,000 can put an agency worth $20,000,000,000 out of business, it is a fair question how much that proposition is worth to the national economy. Obviously mere cheapness is not the whole story.

Fifteen years ago, said this witness, 75 percent of Washington lumber moved by rail and 25 percent by water; now 25 percent moves by rail and 75 percent by water. This further bears out the statement that facts more than 15 years old are no answer to the problem which produced the Pettengill bill.

WHAT HAS SECTION 4 DONE FOR THE WEST?

Another impression I received, which I want to pass on to the West is this, that notwithstanding the restrictive long- and short-haul clause has been in operation for 25 years the West has not developed under it. It has in fact been drying up. This is a matter of common knowledge. Now, mind you, I am not saying that section 4 has prevented the development of the West or its industries, or that it has dried up the West. What I am saying is that this is the situation notwithstanding section 4.

If it could be shown that prior to 1910 industry and commerce were languishing throughout the West, but that since that time they have been springing up and flourishing, it could be recognized as a legitimate argument against disturbing the status quo, whether or not the status quo was responsible. It is difficult to take the conditions existing in the Western States and make out a case for section 4.

WHAT GOVERNOR CHRISTIANSEN SAID OF MINNESOTA IS TRUE OF ALL THE WESTERN STATES

Long- and short-haul clause or no long- and short-haul clause, the West has stood generally still as compared with coast areas. This statement cannot be successfully challenged.

This brings me to an argument made repeatedly by the rail carriers, which I had to admit as valid. The rail carriers said:

The water competition, with its low rates, is already there. If the inland country is at a disadvantage because of low-water rates at the coast that is not of our making; the low-water rates are already there.

The only difference, say the carriers, is that "we are not permitted to participate in the traffic, so our rail lines languish and the inlands languish."

NATIONAL VALUE OF RAILWAYS

Mr. Chairman, I view this subject from the public rather than the private, the national rather than the local, angle. If only consideration of the national defense was involved, measures would be justified to place the railroads of the country upon a self-sustaining basis and preserve them from depletion or injury by obsolescent laws or by other forms of transportation.

There are approximately 250,000 miles of railways in the United States. Under the Transportation Act of 1920, permitting consolidations, nine complete transcontinental systems have been established. These systems, in conjunction with north and south cross lines and innumerable feeders, constitute beyond comparison the country's chief agency of national defense in the field of transportation. No one would claim that this field is one that can be filled by water and motor transportation. As for the Panama Canal as a means of national defense, it is inadequate and uncertain, and as a means of intercoastal traffic it is of minor or no importance, as was shown during the World War, when the railroads handled all the ordinary traffic of the country, both inland and intercoastal, and also the extraordinary traffic incident to the war. The railroads in that great emergency were the sole agency of national transportation. The ships had gone, the trucks and busses had not come, and the railroads did the job. As I stated before the Committee on Rules, handling traffic through the Panama Canal in a national emergency would be like pouring a washtub through a bottle neck.

In the railroads, therefore, we have an adequate and indestructible means of transportation. We should see to it that they are kept in first-class condition, and more especially when it can be done without expense to the Public Treasury and without unduly burdening the users of the railroads. The term "users" of the railroads brings me to another and important angle of this subject. The railroads still are, and unless we destroy them will continue to be, the chief reliance of the masses of the people in the transportation of both passengers and freight. We are all familiar with the fact that railroad service is being depleted, many short lines being abandoned and train service reduced on all lines. This situation results in impaired transportation service to the masses of the people. The whole national rail transportation structure is being impaired. So everything is not fish that comes in the net of cheap competing transportation.

In one way or another the people, who must rely on the railroads, are made to pay for the deteriorating condition of the railroads. They are getting less service and poorer service out of them and they pay in that way, they get less taxes and they pay in that way, they get less of the highest-paid employment in the United States and they pay in that way, and they get deterioration in a national transportation structure, the most permanent, substantial, and dependable yet devised by the genius of man and upon which the safety of the Nation may depend on a day's notice. While we are properly spending many hundreds of millions of dollars in preparedness, let us not overlook the item of transportation, upon which finally all else depends. If Russia had nine first-class rail lines across Siberia, present events and the future history of the world might be different.

PREJUDICE BLINDS FOURTH-SECTION SUPPORTERS TO FACTS

Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out the great changes in the transportation world in recent years which, in my opinion, not only justify but demand a change in the law governing rail transportation. That this opinion has substantial foundation is shown by the change in sentiment which has grown up in the transportation field. There was little opposition to the Pettengill bill in the East, except from the water carriers. Not even motor transportation appeared in opposition to the bill. Traffic interests, manufacturing and commercial interests in New England appeared for the bill; the commercial bodies of Florida; the rice growers of Arkansas; the sugar and cattle growers of Colorado; the canning industry of Iowa and Nebraska; the fruit growers of California; the lumber interests of Washington and the Northwest; mining interests of Utah, Nevada, Montana, Idaho, and New Mexico appeared for the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause. The list has already been inserted in the RECORD by Mr. PETTENGILL.

It must be admitted, however, that there was strong opposition from certain localities in the Mountain States and the Northwest, the nature of which is aptly summed up in the report of the Coordinator of Transportation, Document No. 152, Seventy-third Congress, in the following language:

The support which it (the fourth section) has received from certain sections and interests has bordered on fanaticism.

This fairly characterizes the attitude of a number of opponents of the bill before the subcommittee. The holding companies pleading for their lives were temperate by comparison. It is difficult to reason with that state of mind.

One of the strongest adherents of the long- and short-haul clause is the State of Idaho, which was represented before the committee by several witnesses against the bill.

The principal of these witnesses was Mr. Harry Holden, a member of the Idaho Public Utilities Commission. Mr. Holden gave statistics on two specific Idaho crops, apples and potatoes. Since Idaho is in the forefront to the opposition of this bill and since Mr. Holden was referred to by the other witnesses as being specially qualified and prepared to present Idaho's case against the legislation, I deem his testimony with respect to these two major agricultural products of Idaho of especial significance. I urge you to listen to this.

At page 594 of the hearings, Mr. Holden said:

To give you a better picture, in Twin Falls County alone, in 1918, there were 18,000 acres of commercial orchard and there remain today less than 2,000 acres of orchard and they exist only by reason of the fact that these apples move by truck and not by rail.

It was pointed out to Mr. Holden that this tremendous loss occurred under the existence of the long- and short-haul clause, and he was asked what good it had done Idaho. Mr. Holden replied:

I can answer that question. In 1920 practically every farming community in the State of Idaho was put out of existence by reason of the horizontal raise in freight rates.

Now, remembering this statement, let me again quote. On the next page, 596, Mr. Holden said:

Permit me now to call your attention to potatoes in the Western States where they are produced and the amount of tonnage enjoyed by western railroads. * * * During the years 1922 to 1931, inclusive, there have been produced and shipped by rail, according to the records of the United States Department of Agriculture * * * Idaho 204,390 cars, an annual average of 20,439 cars.

Still quoting:

Likewise, Idaho's production and shipment for the 5 years from 1930 to 1934, inclusive, presents another picture. During these 5 years Idaho shipped by rail 134,827 cars of potatoes, or an average of 27,000 per year, and it now looks like our average will be, if we are permitted to live by the carriers, a yearly average of not less than 30,000 cars annually.

Mr. Chairman, this is a fine showing, but it is a showing which would appear to dispose of Idaho's case against this bill. In the case of exhibit A, the apple orchards, they disappeared under the benign operations and protecting influence of the long- and short-haul clause. In the case of exhibit B, after farming in Idaho "was put out of existence by reason of the horizontal raise in freight rates", to quote the words of the witness, Idaho potato production and shipment by rail increased from 20,000 to 30,000 cars annually.

These two widely different cases occurred at the same time, in the same locality, and under the same law.

It seems easy for witnesses from certain localities to let their zeal against the railroads carry them away and blind them to the real significance of the facts they relate. Mr. Holden is not the only case.

A somewhat similar witness was Mr. Ernest D. Salm, executive secretary of the Utah Citizens' Rate Association. It was really astounding. It was almost incredible.

Beginning at page 687 of the hearings, Mr. Salm devoted almost six pages to showing the enormous cost of railway construction, maintenance, and operation through the State of Utah and to the coast. Apparently in Mr. Salm's mind it would be useless to try to help the railroads against such insurmountable obstacles and unfair to the country traversed by them. He instanced the famous Lucin cut-off over the great Salt Lake, which, he said, cost $10,000,000 for 30 miles of road, all spent in Utah. He instanced 18 miles of snow-sheds costing over $3,000,000. He instanced the use of fire trains by railways, due to desert conditions and entailing great expense, and other things. I could not forbear suggesting to the witness that the cost of the Lucin cut-off was probably more than the railway company would get out of the traffic of Utah in many years. He admitted a statement previously made to the committee by a witness for the bill that there are counties in Utah in which the railroads pay taxes in excess of their total gross revenues from the counties, and that is true in all the Western States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION POLLS SHIPPERS

We are all familiar with the fact that no commission or agency of government voluntarily relinquishes power, but rather seeks to increase it. Still, the coordinator, in House Document No. 89, page 173, Seventy-third Congress, says:

On the whole, sentiment favors modification or repeal. Of the important responses on the question filed with the coordinator, 82 favored some modification, 46 favored repeal, and 47 were against any change.

G. H. Shafer, transportation rate expert of the Illinois State Commerce Commission, a very competent man, stated the case in a paragraph when he said:

If the long- and short-haul provision contained in the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act is repealed, the Interstate Commerce Commission, under sections 1, 2, and 3, could still prevent the carriers from making rates that are unreasonable or discriminatory. The Commission, in addition, has the power to fix minimum rates under section 15, which would prevent the establishment of rates below the cost of transportation. With these powers vested in the Commission, it is no longer necessary to continue in force the long- and short-haul clause.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude with some findings made by me from the testimony in the hearings, which I have found helpful in arriving at a decision on this important piece of legislation.

First. The largely unregulated water and highway transportation which have grown up since 1910, which will not be comparably regulated under proposed legislation, and which are making rapid and continuous inroads on rail transportation, demand that the railroads be given much greater freedom in meeting this competition. It is shown conclusively that the almost total loss of transcontinental rail traffic is due to the undue advantages given water traffic.

Second. Increasing the competitive powers of the railroads cannot drive water and highway transportation from the field or seriously impair them, for the reason that they are cheaper forms of transportation to establish and maintain, and it would be suicidal for the railroads to undertake to underbid them, even if the law permitted it, which it will not.

Third. Water rates have been and are lower than rail rates and lower than the rails can make rates, giving the water points such advantages over inland points as may accrue from lower rates, and this condition will continue to exist, whether section 4 is repealed or not.

Fourth. The existing handicap to the rails is depleting their earning power and physical structure, to the loss as well of all the cities and towns and sections which they serve, impairing their efficiency in that field of transportation for which they are best fitted, and weakening them as an indispensable arm of the national defense.

Fifth. The inland sections have experienced no such industrial and commercial gains under 25 years of the operation of the long- and short-haul clause as would justify any claim of benefit from the existence and operation of the law. It is shown conclusively that the long- and short-haul clause prevents the railroads from extending the market range for inland products in competition with the water haul.

Sixth. The railroads, if given the opportunity, may again become, and should become, self-sustaining and modernized without expense to the Public Treasury; while, on the other hand, continuance of the present unfavorable trend will call for some other means of maintaining to its full usefulness this most essential agency of transportation and defense.

Seventh. Under existing competitive conditions in the field of transportation the railroads would be singled out for no such drastic regulation as that embodied in section 4. If section 4 were out of the law now, it would not now be proposed to restore it. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, as I regard it as unnecessary and, at the same time, harmful legislation. For years the railroads have been under the auspices and protection of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and quasi-judicial machinery has been provided whereby they can, in a proper case, obtain from the Interstate Commerce Commission the relief sought by this legislation. The railroads have obtained relief in 120 cases out of the 150 where they have applied for action, so they have not petitioned in vain.

The history of the railroads prior to 1887 is not pleasant reading. It is a history of economic oppression and political corruption in both the States and the Nation. Through the medium of this unneeded legislation we are at one fell swoop returned to the old days when the railroads exploited or destroyed localities at will. This legislation takes the burden of proof off the railroads and places it on the shoulders of the locality or shipper. To obtain relief the locality or shipper must make a journey to Washington. He must employ rate experts and lawyers familiar with the practice before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The expense of this will be prohibitive, with the result that shippers and localities will be destroyed by the schedules of rates that may be changed at will.

Some of the Members of the House are complacent about this procedure. They fail to consider the far-reaching effect of this legislation. May I say to them that in economic results no legislation has been attempted during my service here which is more far-reaching. Our distances in America are so great that transportation will always be a national problem of first magnitude. I have no quarrel with the railroads, for they have played and are playing an important and necessary part in the national economy and development. I am in favor of proper legislation and even financial aid out of the Federal Treasury for their aid and assistance. I am also in favor of proper, necessary legislation for the splendid group of men who constitute the rank and file of the railroad employees of America.

I am, however, definitely opposed to this legislation, which will work havoc to the shippers and communities of America. If this legislation is passed, it is the purpose of the railroad management to kill off the coastal merchant marine, which is an essential arm of our national defense. It will kill off the waterways in the interior of the country, which are so essential to America's growth and development, and will drive shipping now furnishing low-cost transportation off the Great Lakes and into the discard.

In 10 and even possibly 5 years, water transportation on the coast and in the interior will be murdered in its bed if this bill becomes law. The Motor Carriers' Act, which is now law, will become a nullity, for this legislation will destroy highway transportation lines and will ultimately throw more men out of work than are now employed by the railroads. All of the modern agencies for the convenience of the public will be submerged and destroyed by the passage of this legislation, and out of this legislation will come monopoly of transportation by the railroads, and the history of oppression and corruption that was characteristic of the years before 1887 will be repeated. The battle to prevent the people on the eastern and western coasts and in the interior from being prejudiced will have to be fought all over.

In the brief time allotted me today I do not have an opportunity to discuss the national waterways as I would like to do, but the fact is that railroads have been the chief beneficiary of water transportation. Ninety percent of the American harbors have been improved at the request of the railroads. The classic example of this is the development in and around the city of Pittsburgh. Sixty years ago

German and English experts said that America could never make steel because her iron mines were so far removed from the coal deposits. Lake water transportation was developed and the iron ore was brought at an infinitesimal cost per ton to the city of Pittsburgh, and around this city has come the greatest railroad development in America.

All this has been brought about by the low cost of lake water transportation, and this illustration might be multiplied a hundredfold. I have been on the Rivers and Harbors Committee for 8 years and know something of the national transportation picture. I know something of the monopolistic character of the railroads where they are in command. The railroads once believed that they had a divine right to rule the country and to regulate its destiny. The effects of this legislation will be to revive this obsession; and, in my judgment, this legislation will put them in the saddle again with most disastrous effects to the country.

If you pass this legislation, you are setting the clock back; you are writing a chapter which will not do credit to the economic vision of this House.

On the subject of waterways, may I refer you to Judge MANSFIELD's extension of remarks which appeared in the RECORD on Friday, March 20? It is a fair, clear, and able statement of the part the waterways are playing in the development of the Nation and the result in cost to the people of the country. I commend the reading of Judge MANSFIELD's extension to every Member of the House. It will clarify the situation in their minds and clear away the fog which the railroads have thrown around the part that the waterways are playing in national economics.

The historic sufferers from heavy freight rates have been the American farmers. That fact has been brought out many times before the Rivers and Harbors Committee in hearings. Every farm organization is opposed to this bill, and they are protesting its passage in thunder tones. I call the attention of the House to a letter which I received today from the State master of the New York State Grange on this question. I likewise call attention to a radio talk of Mr. Fred Brenckman, the Washington representative of the National Grange, on the same subject. I ask leave to extend both of these in the RECORD. They are brief.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

The matters referred to are as follows:

NEW YORK STATE GRANGE,
Oswego, N. Y., March 18, 1936.

HON. FRANCIS D. CULKIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CULKIN: You are surely aware that the Pettengill bill, H. R. 3263, would, if passed, work untold injury and hardship upon the agriculture of the entire Nation, as well as all other lines of industry within our borders.

The New York State Grange, through its legislative committee, wishes to register its protest against the passage of this measure. The voice of more than 135,000 grangers in New York State, 6,000 of them in your own county, speaks as one against this injustice to the American farmer.

Hoping that you will use all honorable means with your great influence to prevent its passage, I am,

Most sincerely yours,

RAYMOND COOPER,
State Master, Chairman Legislative Committee.

PART OF RADIO TALK OF FRED BRECKMAN, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE, NATIONAL GRANGE, MARCH 21, 1936

A measure of great importance to farmers and the people of the entire country that is now pending in Congress is the Pettengill bill, H. R. 3263. The passage of this bill would work irreparable injury to agriculture. Its purpose is to repeal the long- and short-haul clause of the Transportation Act. In order that it may be clearly understood by everybody what is meant by this clause, let me explain that under its provisions the railroads are forbidden to charge more for a shorter haul than a longer one, over the same line and in the same direction. The repeal of this clause would pave the way for a cut-throat rate war against boat and truck lines and other competitors of the rail carriers. To finance such a rate war the railroads would keep their freight rates to the intermediate noncompetitive points on a high level.

With this clause repealed they could carry freight at a loss, if necessary, between points where they are thrown into competition with motor and water carriers, until these competitors had been crippled or eliminated. To make up the losses sustained in such rate wars, they would naturally have to charge higher rates between noncompetitive points to avoid bankruptcy themselves.

This kind of legislation would drive industry to the seacoast in order to get cheaper transportation rates, and it would depopulate the interior of the country. It would remove the farmer's market farther and farther from him by destroying the local industries of the interior.

The farmer lives in the interior. The farmer is the intermediate shipper. The farmer is the man who is located at the noncompetitive point and the farmer is the man who would have to pay the bill, in the form of exorbitant freight rates, to finance the railroads in a rate war with other carriers.

Testifying before the Rules Committee of the House at a recent hearing on the Pettengill bill, Coordinator of Transportation Joseph B. Eastman declared that under the present law the Interstate Commerce Commission has all necessary authority to grant lower rates to rail carriers where they are thrown into competition with other transportation agencies, providing the roads can show that such rates are compensatory. Mr. Eastman also stated that during the period that the long- and short-haul clause has been in effect the railroads have made approximately 180 applications for rates enabling them to meet competition of rival carriers at given points. About 150 of these applications have been granted, while only about 30 were refused by the Commission. What more do the railroads want? What more, in common decency, can they ask? The idea that Congress should enact legislation which was placed upon the statute books to put an end to the hoary abuse of charging more for a shorter haul than a longer one on the same line and in the same direction is preposterous and cannot be justified.

Mr. CULKIN. Messrs. Cooper and Brenckman state the case of the farmer fairly and with vigor. I understood the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the father of this bill, to state on Friday that the Farm Bureau Federation was for the legislation. I talked with Mr. Chester Gray, the national representative, this morning, and he said that their central organization has gone on record against it. The gentleman from Indiana, for whose abilities, legislative integrity, and character I have the greatest respect, was mistaken when he made that statement.

I ask the House to defeat this bill. I have faith and confidence in the membership of the House. I urge that this legislation, so fraught with evil to the future of America, be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The American Farm Bureau had at two national conventions endorsed this bill.

Mr. CULKIN. Several State conventions did, but I understand the national conventions always opposed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN] such time as he desires.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened intently to the eloquent and ingenious argument of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] in behalf of his bill proposing to repeal section 4—the long- and short-haul clause—of the Interstate Commerce Act. I find myself in hearty accord with what my colleague had to say about the necessity and the importance of railway transportation. No fair citizen can deny that the railways have performed a great service in the development of the entire country. I also share with my colleague the gratification for the safety and the efficiency of the railways and their perfect record of safety for 1935, in which not a single life was lost in railway transportation.

THANK THE WORKERS

In surveying the benefits that the railroads have contributed to this country, I think we should fully recognize the part of the railway employees. The safety, the convenience, the efficiency of railway transportation is due to the high intelligence, the efficiency, and the loyalty of the men who perform the duties and grave responsibilities involved in railway transportation. It is not to the high-paid executives who sit in lavish offices in the great cities, and much less to the bankers and the brokers who guide the financial course of these utilities, but it is due to the blue-capped engineer whose hand is on the throttle, to the fireman who supplies the fuel, to the conductor, the brakeman, the porter, the station agent, the roundhouse mechanic, the yardman, and the track worker. Safety and efficiency in travel depend upon the loyalty, the sobriety, the clear thinking, the cool-headed conduct of these men. And not all the excellent qualities of these workers can be claimed by all railroad executives. The railway workers, or at least a considerable part of them, are members of the most outstanding organization of the labor world. These men by their own efforts have brought about the enviable position which they hold in organized labor; and it must be said that these splendid men have fought many a battle with railway managers for efficiency, for safety, and for a better standard of wages and hours, which has contributed not only to their own standard of duty and living but has been the chief factor in the success of the railways that employ them.

LOW WAGES FOR SOME

I desire to give due credit to the railways for maintaining a comparatively high standard of wages and a decent standard of living for many of their employees. I am also not unmindful of the fact that the track worker is among the poorly paid employees of this country. Frequently the pay of the track worker is so low that it does not afford a decent standard of American living. The railway track worker has been unable to organize to exert his collective power to secure a wage in comparison with the higher wages paid other employees. Other railway employees themselves, by their own intelligence and organization, have exacted from the reluctant railroads a much better wage. In this connection it might be said that it is regrettable that the American seamen, the worker on the ships and many of the water-front workers, have not been paid a scale of wages in proportion to the skilled mechanics of the railways and of other industries.

A potent influence in behalf of this bill has been brought to bear upon the Members of Congress by the various railway organizations throughout the country. In spite of the unhappy results of the opposition of the railway executives to an adequate railway pension plan and to other reasonable requests, in this instance the employees have rallied to the support of their employers, a further proof of their loyalty. Undoubtedly railroad executives, with their tongues in their cheeks, have held out promises of wider employment, better wages, and other desired emoluments to win the support of the railway workers. If this were the only issue involved in this controversy, I would not raise my voice against this bill but would be very happy to support it.

WHAT THE TESTIMONY SHOWS

I feel that the able gentleman from Indiana did not discuss all the issues raised by his proposed legislation. His argument was a careful and clever camouflage of the real issues in the background and the real purpose of this bill. Anent the suggestion that this measure means wider employment, let me call attention to the railway employees of the Southern Pacific Railway. At a hearing before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on Senate bill 563, to amend section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, held in May and June of 1930, Senator PITTMAN brought out this vital point: That the traffic of the railroads in a period of 12 years had increased 60 percent, but that the railroads had not increased their number of employees in the same proportion. The deduction was that while the railroads are complaining about loss of traffic, it is not because of their interest in their employees, many of whom have been ruthlessly discharged wherever possible.

In 1930, at a hearing held in Phoenix, Ariz., on May 10, 1930, Mr. W. A. Worthington, vice president of the Southern Pacific Railway, testified that in 1930 an increase of approximately 33 1/3 percent in west-bound tonnage and 15 percent in east-bound tonnage could be handled, without an increase of train mileage and without requiring any additional trains; the substance of the contention of the railway representatives being that repeal of the fourth section would enable them to load empty cars, and increase their volume of traffic and their revenues without a corresponding increase in cost, and without the employment of additional labor.

A PECULIAR GENEROSITY

As I see it, the real objective in the proposed repeal of the fourth section is the elimination and destruction, as far as possible, of the competition of the highway and the truck, the waterway and the ship. Railways complain of the competition of the pipe line, the transmission of electric power, and the airplane—all the results of the march of progress. It has been repeated on this floor that the long- and short-haul clause does not apply to the railway's rivals in transportation. So far as I am aware, there has been no evidence introduced to show an abuse of this long- and short-haul principle in other lines of transportation. Sensible truckmen do not violate the sound rule of economics and of business by transporting commodities to a distance of 500 miles for a less amount than for a distance of 300 miles. It is a violation of sound economics to indulge in such practices. Consequently, there must be some particular and peculiar reason why the railways ask for the violation of such a generally accepted rule. Can you give any good reason why a meat market should sell a thousand pounds of meat for a less price than it receives for 750 pounds? Can you give any good reason why a grocery should sell a thousand sacks of sugar to the same customer for a less price than it sells him 500 sacks? Can you give any good reason why a clothing house should sell three suits of clothes or three pairs of shoes for a less price than it sells two suits or two pairs? Is there any sound reason why the poultryman should sell 10 dozen eggs for less money to the same customer than 5 dozen eggs? What would you think of a worker who offered his toil for 12 months for less than he obtained for 10?

The Pettengill bill is a most clever and adroit proposal to cover ruthless and ruinous discrimination with a cloak of legality. From the standpoint of economics and commerce it offers a fallacious policy. For what reason does a railway desire to transport commodities 3,000 miles for less than it would charge to transport the same commodities a distance of 2,000 miles over the same rails? What is the purpose of a railway's desiring to offer to transport the manufactured goods of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, and similar points, to Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Seattle for less tariff than it charges for the transportation of the same cars and similar goods to intermediate points, such as Wichita, Fort Worth, Denver, Phoenix, Salt Lake, Spokane, and other points?

REVISED RATE STRUCTURE NEEDED

The bug in the rug in this instance is a purpose to carry out a program that discriminates against intermediate points and for the sole purpose of destroying water and truck commerce between competitive points. Industry and agriculture and commerce everywhere would greet with cheers any earnest and honest effort to reduce railway transportation rates throughout this country. The railway rate structure of this country is a modern puzzle system that would confuse a Chinese lawyer or the author of a Dutch almanac. The railway executives of this country could do this country a great service if they would but simplify rate structures, eliminate some of the discriminating advantages of competitive points, and give the intermediate points, cities, and towns, an opportunity of commercial and industrial development.

DISCRIMINATIONS ROB AND DESTROY

Allow me to give an example of the discriminations that exist today to the advantage of competitive points. Car-load rates on commodities are the same from San Francisco and Los Angeles into Arizona and New Mexico. Los Angeles, geographically and by the usual travel routes, is but half the distance from this territory as is San Francisco. From the standpoint of logic and economics as applied to the cost of transportation, one would arrive at the conclusion that the point but half the distance should have a correspondingly less rate. But such is not the practice. I once lived in a small town in northwest Missouri, known as Parnell. It was a half-way railway point between Kansas City and Des Moines; yet the railways would deliver lumber in Des Moines at the same freight rate as in Parnell, twice the distance. Under the fourth section, this discrimination is not a violation of the law, which only limits the railway to charges for a long haul that are not less than for the short haul. But it is easy to see the effect on a small town.

Repeal of the fourth section as proposed would permit the railways to take rate making into their own hands and permit them to charge less for a long haul than a short haul. You would upset not only the transportation rate structure but you would disturb commerce, industry, and agriculture in every part of the country. It would be within the power of the railways, if they so desired, to haul Oregon wheat to Minneapolis and Chicago at a less rate than would be charged to the wheat farmers of Kansas. It would give the railways the legal right to ship flour from St. Louis to Denver for a less rate than from Topeka and other intermediate points. The same discriminations might be applied from Minneapolis to New Orleans, Galveston, and other competitive points. It would permit the railways to charge less for the transportation of rubber tires from Ohio to points in the Northwest than from the tire factories of Los Angeles. It would permit the shipping of all kinds of products east of the Mississippi to the Pacific coast for a less charge than from points in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and other inland States. Such a change in railway charges would close the doors in hundreds of factories not only on the Pacific coast but in other parts of the interior. It would wholly upset the basis upon which local manufacturing and distribution is now conducted. In some parts of the country it would throw thousands of men out of work. It would place the commercial and industrial enterprises of thousands of intermediate towns and cities at the mercy of railway executives, their whims, and their personal and selfish concern. And for what purpose? Only to enable railways to grab a larger volume of traffic from the highways and waterways, and probably without the running of an extra train or the employing of an extra man.

FAIR PLAY FOR WHOM?

The proponents of the Pettengill bill have talked much about fair play. What would such a policy do to the merchant marine? It would practically destroy all intercoastal shipping. It would deprive the ships plying between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast of their cargoes. This intercoastal shipping amounts to approximately \$40,000,000 annually as against the three billion yearly income of the railways, which amounted to six billions before the depression. If the railways secured all this intercoastal transportation business, it would add but $1\frac{1}{3}$ percent to their present revenues. This bill gives no consideration to nor does it count the cost to the 165,000 American seamen now employed by our merchant marine. Thousands of these seamen would be thrown out of employment. Other thousands of water-front employees—dock workers, warehouse employees, clerks, and checkers—would be thrown out of jobs. Analysis of the hearings on the repeal of the fourth section raises a doubt of any added employment by the railroads, but there is no question as to the result of unemployment to ships and trucks if this measure should be enacted into law.

LOS ANGELES A VICTIM

My own city of Los Angeles has expended approximately $50,000,000 in the development of one of the outstanding ports of the world. The city of Los Angeles has a bonded harbor indebtedness of $30,000,000. Not only would thousands of workers around this port be deprived of employment but the harbor revenues of the city would be seriously depleted, throwing additional burdens on the groaning taxpayer. Harbor improvements, because of loss of revenue, would fall into decay. This harbor has developed a commerce that has averaged some 20,000,000 tons per annum during the past 10 years. It has saved to the people of the Southwest at least a hundred million dollars per year in transportation costs.

If the railways succeed in destroying this water competition, it will follow, as the night the day, that the railway rates would advance and the people of the Southwestern States would again be at the mercy of a monopolized railway-transportation system, as they were before the completion of the Panama Canal.

Some of those advocating the Pettengill bill have complained of the air, the seas, the rivers, and the lakes as if they were the transgressors in this transportation picture. According to their inverted viewpoint, divine authority should be on the side of the railways, and the air, the rivers, and the lakes, and the seas should be penalized for invading their rights. Let us not forget that the natural transportation system of the world for centuries has been by water. The sea and the rivers and the lakes are open to whomever may desire to use them. It is the greatest highway system of the globe and it gave its service to humankind ages before the toot of the locomotive was heard as it came 'round the bend.

THE QUESTION OF TAXES

Our eloquent colleague from Indiana emphasized the larger amount of taxes paid by the railroads than by the ships. I accept that statement as correct, but I am quite sure that the keen and analytical gentleman from Indiana is aware of the fact that the right-of-way of the ship and the barge is not taxable property. Permit me to remind the gentleman that there are few schoolhouses on the right-of-way of the ship and the barge and they have no part in the transportation of a vast area of our interior; and further, railway terminals require a very heavy investment which are within the boundaries of our many cities where real estate is valuable. On the other hand, steamship lines rarely own their shipping terminals; they own no sidetracks, no depots, no roundhouses, and many other accessories which are necessary to railway transportation. Would the proponents of the Pettengill bill tax the rivers, the lakes, the seas, the air, and the highways to defeat fair and up-to-date competition? Their ardor for the railways carries them into a whirlwind of contradiction and blinds their vision in a dust storm of fallacy. The statement was made that railroads paid 8 percent of their gross income for taxes in 1934. The National Association of Manufacturers is authority for the statement that during the same year over 27 percent of the national income went for taxes. The inference is plain.

THE SCARECROW ON THE JOB

Another advocate of the Pettengill bill used the ragged and weather-beaten scarecrow of Government ownership. I have no share in his fears. In the long years of prosperity the railways made no provision for a rainy day, no earnings were set aside to discharge their growing debts, but they permitted themselves to thoughtlessly coast downgrade to inevitable bankruptcy. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation rescued many from their folly. Judging from government ownership of railways in foreign countries, we have nothing to fear from this drummed-up bugaboo. The objective of public ownership is service and the purpose of private ownership is profit, and the patron and the worker of the rails might both welcome a policy of better service for all and less profit and high salaries to a few.

RAILROADS WON THE WAR

The advocates of this proposed repeal of the fourth section have emphasized the part that the railways have played in national defense, and would have you believe they won the war. But they attained their best service under the direction of Uncle Sam and Uncle BILL McADOO. These ardent advocates ignore the vast importance of the merchant marine in case of war. A merchant marine is a formidable part of national defense to both the Army and the Navy. Without a merchant marine the efficiency of both Army and Navy would be seriously impaired. Recall the frantic and expensive efforts to build a merchant marine during the late World War. Our national neglect of a merchant marine placed our Nation in a helpless and dependent position. Billions of funds were extravagantly poured out to supply this deficiency. Are we so soon to forget this costly lesson, after spending billions to foster shipbuilding and the maintenance of a merchant marine? Are we going to doze off into lassitude and lethargy and permit the railroads to utterly destroy one of the most important adjuncts of national defense?

OPEN AGAINST CLOSED ROUTES

Much is said about the competition of the highway—the stages and the trucks. The highway, like the water route, is open to the use of everybody. Its right-of-way is not monopolized as is the right-of-way of a railway. The waterway, the highway, and the airway are the only routes of transportation that are free from monopoly and open to all. In this evolution of transportation in which the highway has become such an important part, are we to curb it, to restrain it, to destroy it, in order to preserve a monopoly for railway transportation? If the truck and the stage, with door-to-door service, are such transportation plagues, why do the railways engage in the business of which they so loudly complain? In some instances their venture into this field is evidently to drive out competition and to restore their monopoly of transportation. This same attitude has been pursued toward waterways for many years. Many instances can be shown where the truck, the bus, the barge, and the ship are used as feeders and make an important contribution to the business of the rails.

ALL THE TRAFFIC COULD BEAR

During the World War period railway passenger rates were boosted to 3.6 cents per mile, plus a 50-percent Pullman surcharge. After the depressing effects following the war began to be felt, the railways made no attempt to meet the requirements of the public, but continued to charge the inflated prices of former years. The railroads consequently suffered tremendous loss in both freight and passenger traffic. In the foreign countries of the world which I have visited I have found the rate for first-class travel approximately the same as in our own. But in all of these countries, without any exception, there is also maintained a second-class, and perhaps a third- or a fourth-class rate of travel corresponding to the financial ability of those who desire to travel. Instead of meeting this situation as in other countries, when the stage began to invade the province of the railways, did they reduce their charges to meet such competition? No; they began to clamor to Congress to eliminate this competition. In many instances the railroad executives organized stage companies and paralleled their own railway tracks and lived off the traveling public that would have patronized the railroad had the passenger rates been attractive. Some of the western and southern railroads, observing and analyzing the situation, reduced their rates to meet bus competition. We all know the result. Railway travel immediately increased. Revenues rose materially, the railways profited accordingly. Now the Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered a general reduction of railway fares on the theory that the railways will profit and the public be benefited.

RAILWAYS SET UP COMPETITION

I want to cite an example that I observed last year after the adjournment of Congress. While in New York I desired to visit Boston. I purchased a stage ticket on a line currently reported to be allied with the New York & New Haven Railway. This ticket cost $3.75, while independent lines were offering this same service for $3. This stage contained 30 seats, and I noted that every one was occupied. Upon my return from Boston I purchased a railway ticket on the New York & New Haven for $8.26. The car in which I rode had a capacity of 80 passengers. There were 16; only 20 percent of the car was occupied. Is it sound business to haul empty cars with a high fare and carry passengers at low rates by stage, operating the car on the railroad and the bus on the highway, in the same direction and to the same destinations? It appears to be business folly.

FOURTH SECTION SOUND

I believe the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act is sound and logical. A railway cannot, by any reasonable conception, haul commodities 2,000 miles for less money than it can haul the same cars over the same tracks for a distance of a thousand or fifteen hundred miles. The theory of the Pettengill bill is utterly fallacious, in my opinion. It is a camouflaged iniquity. It will bring innumerable hardships on all intermediate points. It will establish much more flagrant discriminations between industries and cities than now exists, and which should be corrected. It will destroy our merchant marine, throw thousands of seamen and water-front workers out of employment, without bringing a corresponding increase in labor and wages to the railroad employees. Under the Pettengill bill the Panama Canal, now paying its way, would become a Government liability. The same fate would result to many municipal harbors. The destruction of our merchant marine would be a deplorable impairment of national defense.

TWO KINDS OF WATER

The railways chronically complain about water transportation; but the public, the investor, the consumer, and the worker have also complained about the "water" in the railways—not in their equipment, but in their financial structure, their stocks and bonds. This Congress could render real service to the railways and to the public if it rejected this measure and then proceeded on constructive lines to loosen the railways from the stifling grip of banking trusts; from stock-exchange manipulations; from financial rackets, which have piped off their earnings, burdened them with unnecessary indebtedness, prevented them from using their earnings for better tracks, better equipment, and better wages; and encourage them to reduce their overhead capital structure somewhere on a par with actual investment and actual value.

SOCIAL WELFARE INVOLVED

A sociological factor of huge importance is involved in railway-rate structures. Railway discriminations have contributed prosperity to favored individuals and driven others to penury and despair. Railway favoritism has enriched one industry and depleted its competitors. Railway discrimination has driven the factory, the pay rolls, and the population from the intermediate towns, with their adjacent wide acres of plenty, to the congested centers of population, and condemned thousands to murky air, to hunger, to slums, and to a sordid and barren existence. Does this Congress propose to enact legislation that will further contribute to our problem of city congestion, poverty, disease, and crime, or shall we "stop, look, and listen" and halt these unfair public policies that promote profit for a few and disregard the economic and social welfare of the multitude?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO].

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, this brief time is hardly sufficient to go into this subject, and I just want to touch upon one or two points that seem to me to be important.

When the proponents of this bill say that this legislation will mean the filling of empty freight cars that are now being hauled by the railroads, what do they mean? Thirty-three percent of the cars that are hauled out west are empty. Fifteen percent of the cars that are hauled east are empty. All this legislation means is that the railroads are trying to get additional freight to fill those empty cars. They are not going to add to the number of cars hauled. Therefore I ask you, How are they going to increase employment of railroad labor when the labor is already hauling the empty cars? It seems to me that the railroad labor organizations have been greatly imposed upon in being urged to support this legislation in view of the true facts. J. R. Bell, attorney for the Southern Pacific Co., set forth in a brief before the Interstate Commerce Commission that an increase of approximately one-third in west-bound tonnage could be handled without any increase in train mileage—that is, without adding any additional trains—and that the east-bound tonnage could be increased 15 percent without requiring increased train mileage. It follows that if there is no gain in train mileage and no additional trains are added, then there can be no increase in employment for train crews.

As far as I have been able to learn, the railroad labor organizations' own paper, Labor, has not once so much as commented in any way favorable toward this proposed legislation. If their organizations are for this legislation, why has not their own periodical endorsed the Pettengill bill?

In the Fourth Annual Report of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation appears this item:

It should be said that the railroads appear to attach unwarranted significance, even from their own point of view, to the emasculation of the fourth section which they have proposed. All that they could hope to gain would be an opportunity to obtain additional traffic on a very low basis of rates yielding some slight margin over so-called out-of-pocket cost. However, such cost is a fluctuating thing, dependent in part on whether or not it is necessary to operate more trains to carry the additional traffic. If more trains become necessary, out-of-pocket costs rise sharply.

Railroads are not interested in increasing their out-of-pocket costs, and to prevent doing so, would pare personnel to the bone under such circumstances. How can labor benefit in such a situation?

Moreover, if freight rates are to be reduced to any degree, how are the revenues of the railroads to be increased? Yet we are implored to pass this legislation to save the $26,000,000,000 railroad corporations from impending bankruptcy! Undoubtedly, then, it cannot be the purpose of the railroads to materially or generally reduce freight rates.

The real purpose of this legislation is to free the railroads from the restrictions of the fourth section. They have already been freed in 120 out of 150 cases, but what they are after is a blanket license to enable them to establish whatever rates they may desire.

They want two things. One is to establish reduced freight rates wherever competition exists, and the other is to eliminate the words "reasonably compensatory." That is the sole purpose of this legislation. The railroads want a free hand to suppress competition wherever they find it, whether it be on the highways, with trucks or busses, or out upon the rivers or on the seas, in the form of ships. It is merely a case of trying to restore to the railroads the monopoly which they owned in years gone by, and it is not a desire to reduce freight rates generally throughout the country. If it were, I would be for this legislation.

Gentlemen have told you not to go back in the history of the railroads; not to go back beyond a period of 15 years. Why? They do not want you to look at the conditions that existed in the country when the railroads had a situation under the legislation existing at that time, which they desire to create again by removing the fourth section.

You have received a tremendous amount of mail regarding this legislation. The railroads have been conducting a very effective lobby in order to force this legislation upon the country. I was very much surprised one morning, on opening my mail, to find from Los Angeles an air-mail letter sent to me, and in which letter the stationery was a total blank. What did that indicate? Simply this: Undoubtedly the agents of the railroads have been going out to business firms throughout southern California and have been getting them to write letters to Members of Congress. In order to prevent those business firms from inadequately or erroneously discussing a subject that is very complicated, the railroads would get the letterheads and envelopes of these business firms, then fill in the desired matter on that letterhead, and have one of the stenographers sign the name and mail out the letter. Here in this letter which I show you they merely forgot to put in the message.

In order to substantiate my statements in that regard, I sent a number of these letters that I have received in behalf of this legislation down to the Department of Justice in order that they might be checked.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a letter I received from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, which shows conclusively that of the first half dozen letters I sent down to the Department of Justice from these different business firms all were written on the same typewriter and the envelopes were typed by the same machine. The same was true of four of the letters in the second group.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from California is granted.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION,
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1936.

HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I beg to advise, in response to your letter of March 18, 1936, that the questioned letters have been examined.

The examiner states that he has reached the conclusion that all of the letters in group 1 were typewritten on the same typewriter. These include the letters of [four business firms were named]. This includes both envelopes and letters.

As to the signatures on these letters, the examiner has reached no conclusion, because of the fact that the signatures themselves are not adequate for this purpose. Each of the names is different, presenting different combinations of letters, preventing in this way the appearance of such similarities in shape as will prove identical. The fact that certain features, such as slant, speed, motion, and other characteristics of this kind are similar, would indicate the possibility that proof of identity might be found if adequate specimens could be obtained. These specimens would consist of the writing of similar words by the person or persons suspected.

With reference to group 2, the examiner has reached the conclusion, on the basis of the same evidence as was found in the group 1 letters, that certain of these letters were written on the same typewriter as the group 1 letters. These letters are those of [four additional companies are named]. All of these letters were written on the same typewriter, which is the typewriter which was used in all of the group 1 letters.

The remainder of the letters of group 2 are believed to have each been written on different machines, each of which is different from the other. The letters found dissimilar from the others are [three other companies are named].

In addition to the evidence with regard to the typewriters, an examination of the envelopes has led the examiner to believe that all of those used with the group 1 letters are similar stationery. These envelopes match in every detail, indicating that they came from the same source. None of the envelopes of the group 2 letters were similar to each other or to the envelopes used on the group 1 letters, with the exception of that used on the Vernon Potteries Co. letter. This envelope is similar to all of those used on the group 1 letters. In this connection attention is invited to the fact that the typewriting appearing on this letter is not like the others.

With reference to the characteristics of the person performing the typewriting, there are certain features which are similar, but as it is probable a deliberate effort was made to disguise in this particular, no conclusion that the same person wrote all the letters which were written on one machine may be drawn.

In accordance with your request, the original letters are being returned by special messenger under separate cover.

With reference to your inquiry regarding whether the identification of the typewriting on different letters with each other is "beyond a reasonable doubt", the examiner states that he is prepared to demonstrate evidence in the specimens referred to above. With regard to those letters believed to have been written on the same machine, this evidence includes defects in the forms of certain type, such as are caused by wear, and which do not exist in exactly this form in any other typewriter. The examiner is prepared to give a demonstration of this evidence similar to that used in court.

With expressions of my highest esteem and best regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

JOHN EDGAR HOOVER, Director.

Mr. COSTELLO. Among these letters was one from a firm located at Brawley, Calif., over 150 miles south of Los Angeles, while another is from a firm located at Santa Maria, Calif., which city is more than 175 miles north of Los Angeles. Yet both of these letters were postmarked from Los Angeles!

It requires no hundred-thousand-dollar investigation to deduce these facts, which revealed the activity of the lobby behind this legislation. As a result, members of the committee, I refuse to be impressed by the huge mass of letters that daily reach my desk. These letters are meaningless. They are the product of a fictitious interest to force vicious legislation through Congress.

This lobby is merely another attempt of the special interests to once more defeat and prevent the regulation and control of public utilities in the public interest. Eventually the huge fraud that is being foisted on the American people by the railroad interests will be revealed when the harmful effects of this legislation, if enacted, are felt throughout the country. I hope that the Members will defeat this bill and not thereby admit that they have submitted to the threats and demands of this false and fictitious meaningless mass of correspondence.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think my mental attitude is a great deal different at this moment from that of probably a majority of the Members of this House. I have not made up my mind on this legislation. I am seeking light. I yield to no man in this House in the desire to put unemployed people to work.

I have been advised by labor groups that all the present bill seeks to do is to permit the railroads to do some extra through-freight hauling that they cannot do now. It is represented to me that the passage of this bill will not increase the freight rates in North Dakota or anywhere else, but will reduce them, if the extra hauling permitted in this bill will reduce the overhead of the railroads, thus making a lower rate possible.

It has further been represented to me that the repeal of paragraph 1 of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act will not open the door to a cutthroat rate war, but that any rate published by the railroads after the passage of this act must provide a compensatory rate because of the provisions of section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

It has been further represented to me that as the law now stands the railroads are tied "with their hands behind their back" and cannot compete with water rates. As a result they lose through-freight business or long-haul business which they formerly had, and consequently railroad crews are laid off, cars and engines are tied up, and the railroad trackage used for only a limited time of which it is capable of handling trains.

Before voting for this legislation I want someone in this House to substantiate what I have been told is the purpose of this bill. There are many things about this bill at the present moment on which my mind is not clear. I have asked for this opportunity to speak, not against the bill but for the purpose of having the doubts that have arisen in my mind cleared. I trust either the author of this bill or some other proponent will present full assurance that this bill is right and just to all.

My first question is: Under the present law, cannot the railroads make application to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have the authority for establishing a less rate for a long haul than a short haul over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter haul included in the longer haul?

Question no. 2: If the railroads can show that the new rate which they desire to publish is a compensatory rate, is there any fear that the Interstate Commerce Commission will deny their petition?

Question no. 3: Is it a fact that heretofore the railroads have made application, showing that the new rate is compensatory and that the Interstate Commerce Commission has rejected the application?

Question no. 4: After reading section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act, I am in grave doubts of the authority therein conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to rule out a rate that is not compensatory.

Question no. 5: Should this act be passed, and the railroads publish their rates, how will those rates be questioned? Who will present the petition? Will this not put too great a burden on the shippers, resulting in more expense, to contest the rate than the amount involved warrants? In other words, will not the railroads have an advantage which will practically remain uncontested?

Question no. 6: If the bill permits the railroads to publish a rate on coastal shipments that will not pay the cost of operation, will not the railroads suffer a net loss in the undertaking? If they do, will not the railroads be compelled to raise interior rates, where there is no water competition, and raise the freight rates on shipments to and from North Dakota and other landlocked States.

Question no. 7: Do you think the passage of this bill will put the 600,000 idle railroad employees, or a major part of them, back to work? In other words, is the present Interstate Commerce Commission law the approximate cause of this great loss of employment?

In answering these questions to my satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of a great many other Congressmen whom I know to be in doubt, bear in mind that many of us, and the public quite generally, believe that the attitude of the railroads themselves has contributed much to the present unemployment situation of railroad labor. Among some of the facts generally believed are:

First. That railroad executives have not in the past, nor do I believe they do now, definitely and clearly understand their relation to our transportation problem. Their position should be that of a servant of the people in the transportation business and not the master of the people. There was a time when they were complete masters in the business life, the economic life, the political life, the social life, of many States. Nothing has dislodged them from this high command, except competition and the Interstate Commerce Act. That competition is here now by water, pipe lines, automobiles, trucks, and airplanes.

Second. The only right railroads in the future will have to survive is their ability to meet competition and render a service that the people will support. The railroads in the past 50 years have been woefully indolent in the matter of scientific improvements. They have been asleep at the switch and other means have been perfected that have given the public quicker, better, and cheaper service. I can illustrate this by saying that for every ton of freight moved today, the railroads have to move 2½ tons by reason of unwieldy, heavy, and out-of-date boxcars and unscientific motive power. This kind of system has nothing to look forward to except absolute extinction. If kept up long enough, freight railroad service will become as extinct as living dinosaur. Some railroads during the past few months have installed scientifically equipped cars for hauling automobiles, and as a result the income of the roads went up and the ground trailing of cars slackened.

Third. If the railroads are in the financial plight which they claim, would it not be becoming to railroad executives to be content with a reasonable salary? Railroads for several years have been, and are now, paying exorbitant and unconsionable salaries to the chief executives. It would be a mark of good faith, at least, to grant salaries that are commensurate with the period of depression from which we are striving to rise. I insert here a table of those salaries. There is no railroad executive living that could possibly be worth in the railroad service one-half of the amount which they are receiving today.

Fourth. As an emergency measure, most people in this country, including those whose relation with railroads in the past has not been pleasing or satisfactory, are willing to pass most any act to put men to work. I desire now to vote for this bill—on one hope only—that it will put the idle railroad men back to work. The railroad men plead for the enactment of this law. From my State I represent labor as well as all other members of society, and although for 30 years I have never made a move in the political life of the State which has not been opposed by the railroad interests. I can forget that in the cause of unemployment in the cause of the country.

I hope my questions will be answered and that after they are I shall feel more free to give my support to this measure. Should this act be passed and should the railroads come out with rates not intended to give them additional business on a compensatory basis, but will institute a rate war that is not intended to meet competition but to destroy it, and leave the railroads free, raise rates generally, to again become masters of the people, I want the record to show that I have no fears of it now. Should that come to pass an indignant people will rise in their wrath and demand a repeal of the act at the next Congress. Should my fears not be well founded, my only explanation will be that I have remembered too well the past, to have that degree of confidence in the future action of the railroads that this bill recommends.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the delegation from California, I wish to register my attitude toward this bill and say that I am in favor of its passage. [Applause.] I wish to state why I, as a Member of this great west-coast State delegation, feel I can support this bill. I have no right to take a narrow or prejudiced view on legislation that affects my country. The 48 States of this Union are an empire, and as was said by Cardinal Richelieu—These words were put in his mouth by the great author Bulwer Lytton—"There should flow in this vast empire trade, the calm health of the nation", and trade is the calm health of a nation. My friends, I wonder what Los Angeles Harbor would look like, or San Francisco or New York or Charleston or Seattle, if the rails that led to these points were allowed to rust. I wonder how the ships that would dock there would be able to convey into or out of these harbors the traffic that might accumulate at just one of these places.

Mr. Chairman, before the American merchant marine in its regenerated period appeared, the rails had been for years. California is vitally interested in the passage of this bill, and I regret that I am forced to disagree with some of my colleagues from this State. I have said that we are an empire. We are like the three men in the tub, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker. I have no right to disregard the interests of other sections of the country. We are all in the same boat. I have no right to say I am not my brother's keeper in the northwest section, the southern section, or the eastern section.

The railroads of this country represent the largest investment of capital, outside of the Government bonds, of the United States of America. I have a wire sent me recently by the president of the California Fruit Growers' Association, which says that this association representing nearly 15,000 growers of citrus fruit in California and Arizona is vitally interested in the legislation relating to transportation of California products, and so forth and so on, and they urge me to vote for this bill. I have here a wire from the American Fruit Growers, Inc., of California. Mr. Chairman, contrary to what might appear from the remarks of my colleague from southern California, I hold in my hands a sheaf of correspondence from my State and my section of Los Angeles. This is only part of the communications that have come to me. I grabbed them off my desk and culled them over while sitting here to find how many of the institutions and individuals who have written me were opposed to this bill. Out of this great sheaf of correspondence I find but three.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, it is not true that the business interests of my State would find the passage of this bill inimical to their best interests.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Permit me to finish my statement.

Mr. Chairman, my particular district is not a manufacturing district. It does not grow fruit. It is a cluster of 370,000 souls who are consumers and who are trying to make a living in professional and other vocations. In this district no doubt live thousands of persons, widows and orphans, whose trust estates and guardianship estates contain one or more securities based upon the railroad interests of this country. I wonder what would happen through the years to these investments? Do you know that the insurance companies of this Nation possess $3,896,000,000 worth of the bonds of railroads? Do you know that the Mutual savings banks hold $1,023,000,000 worth of these bonds, and that the national and other banks hold $1,147,000,000, and educational institutions hold $271,000,000 of these bonds, and foundations $284,000,000? All the others, amongst which are those I represent, because there are no insurance companies in my district, there are no great national savings banks in my district—all the others hold as much as all these I have mentioned combined, $5,709,000,000. Do you suppose I will vote against their interests? I cannot take a narrow view of this thing; I cannot disregard the interests of these people who still have some securities and some of this world's goods.

The railroads of this country are entitled to have their securities and their earning power safeguarded. Mr. Chairman, getting back to the individual example, may I say that almost 100,000 carloads of oranges a year move out of my State. Bear in mind that this is not 100,000 boxes, but 100,000 carloads. Do not confuse the idea with boxes. Do you know what 100,000 carloads of oranges is? With all of the facilities which the merchant marine possesses they could only carry 2,500 carloads of oranges out of the 100,000 carloads. The best interests of the fruit growers, the vegetable growers, who represent another 100,000 carloads, the walnut growers and the producers of other kinds of produce in my State, will be served if this bill is passed, so that there will be a continuance of the maintenance of railroad facilities.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. For the purpose of completing the accurate statement which the gentleman has made, may I offer the suggestion that the shippers of deciduous fruits alone shipped 100,000 additional carloads from California in the year 1935 and only 500 by water. May I say further that the growers of vegetables and melons shipped another 100,000 carloads out of the State of California. This shows that the perishable industry of California, in order to obtain adequate distribution, is tied down to rail facilities.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, the State of California is still a great agricultural State. Its other business might be oil, movies, and so forth. However, one railroad car could carry every film manufactured in California in the course of a year, but one freight car could not begin to carry the produce of my great State.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will give this bill their very serious consideration and that it will pass. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time I have at my disposal to discuss this subject I will not be able to develop the argument as I had hoped. Rather, I will have to state my views in the form of conclusions.

Mr. Chairman, I am against this measure because it represents, in my opinion, the most reactionary proposal that has been brought to my attention during my membership in this House. [Applause.] This is a bill which would turn back the hands on the clock of time to more than a generation ago, to the days of the tooth and claw when the railroads followed practices so hateful that the American people, oppressed beyond endurance, arose in virtual revolt. In desperation they set in motion a campaign which was diligently pursued down through the years until the victory was won, and there was written on the statute books of these United States this most beneficent statute, section 4 of the Transportation Act. The bill under consideration, if passed by this Congress, will eliminate that section from our law books and bring back all the evils of the hated past.

In listening to the argument for the repeal of this section, and it is all of that, I have noticed that the various speakers have adverted from time to time to the idea that the poor railroad has been much abused, and is, therefore, entitled to some sort of emergency relief; that the railroad has become the victim of an unholy alliance of competing transportationists who are threatening to destroy a helpless rail system tied down like the fabled giant of Gulliver's Travels—that engrossing story of the days of our youth. They remind us that in 1929 the railroads had a gross income of $6,000,000,000 and that this tremendous income has dwindled, presumably because of ship competition, to the low, in 1934, of $3,000,000,000. They would have you believe that it was because of section 4 that the gross earnings of the railroads dropped from $6,000,000,000 in that year of 1929 to $3,000,000,000 in 1934. Let me pause right here to recall to the memories of the Members of the House that, in 1929, when the railroads produced their greatest gross income, section 4 was on the statute books and in full force and effect. In other words the greatest earnings that ever came to them at any time came to them when section 4 was on the statute books. True, in 1934 their earnings did fall to $3,000,000,000, but they have not remained at that low continually since that time. Those gross earnings are in no danger of falling lower, on the contrary, in 1935, the year just closed, railroad earnings climbed to $3,632,100,034, and, according to the estimates drawn from the record of the railroads' business for the last 3 months, taking into consideration the business of January, February, and March, up to the present time, the earnings for the railroads in 1936 will reach the very substantial figure of $4,176,915,039. As an indication of what to expect in the near future, only day before yesterday one of the greatest railroad executives in the United States, Mr. Ralph Budd, president of both the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad and the Colorado & Southern Railroad made a most optimistic statement in respect to the future of railroading in the United States. President Budd said, and I quote from the Washington Herald of March 20:

An increasingly optimistic picture confronts the railroads of the Middle West. My own road has found for the first 3 months this year an average increase of 15 percent in hauling virtually all commodities.

Mr. Chairman, that clears up the matter which has been used here as an argument for the elimination of ship and truck competition. The railroad business is not on the decline. On the contrary, the days ahead are bright days—days of promised profits and plentiful employment for those who labor in this greatest of all industries.

What is the reason for that falling off in railroad earnings? The answer is plain enough. It is simply because of that of which we hear so much in this Chamber when other bills are under consideration, and that is "Old John Depression." Just as soon as this depression is over—and the end is in sight—railroad earnings will be as great and greater than they have ever been in the past. So the argument that the railroads have been unfairly dealt with under section 4; the argument that they are entitled to relief because of loss of income due to the competition of ships, airplanes, the air, electric wires, and the pipe lines is entirely fallacious and should not engage the attention of thinking men.

What does this bill that we are asked to repeal provide? It simply lays down two general principles. First, the railroads shall not be permitted to charge less for a longer distance than the aggregate charges for the included shorter distances. Second, the railroads shall not be permitted to charge more for the longer distance than the aggregate of the shorter included distances, unless—and let me impress this upon the Members—they are permitted so to do by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroads are not prevented from doing anything that they seek to be authorized to do under the terms of the Pettengill bill. They can do precisely that under the present statute, all that they may do if this bill before us is passed, but they must go before the Commission and show that their proposed rates are just. If they want to establish lower rates for a longer distance, they must show that a special case exists and that the unfair competition they seek to meet is real and not merely potential. Are not the people entitled to some protection? Is this too much to ask of them? I do not think so.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to take any part whatsoever in this debate. I do so now merely to correct a false inference that has been raised here by several gentlemen and, more recently, by the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO], to the effect that there will be no increase in the employment of railroad men by virtue of the enactment of this bill because the cars are now being hauled west empty, and they will still be hauled west but under load, and the movement of cars will not be increased.

Any man who has learned his railroading on the rails and not out of a book or from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD knows that 75 percent of all the cars that move west of Denver empty are refrigerator cars. They are moved west empty for the purpose of bringing back, under ice, fruits, vegetables, meats, and other perishable goods. These cars will continue to move west empty. They will continue to move west empty because the railroads are not going to load scrap iron or sand or machinery in refrigerator cars. This cannot be done. Refrigerator cars are not built to carry rough freight. In addition, you will have new traffic that will move in newly loaded box and gondola cars. However, we will presume that these gentlemen who got their railroading from the Lord knows where are telling the truth—

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Not now. I will yield later if I have sufficient time.

Mr. COLDEN. I would refer the gentleman to the Southern Pacific officials themselves.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If these gentlemen to whom I have referred are making correct statements about the empties, you would still have an increase in employment. You would have this increase in employment because the loaded car must be spotted to be loaded by a switching crew, it must be inspected by a car inspector, waybills must be made out by clerks, you must have it weighed, and the weight must be recorded. You must also put it in the shop loaded where you do not put in empties for light repairs. All these things would mean thousands of additional employees under this bill.

As before stated, it was to correct this inference that I took the floor and for the further reason that it has been stated here we are deeply interested in the waterways. Why, all the ships in the United States under the American flag today could be bought for $200,000,000. They were a drug on the market after the war and, considering the comparative value between the cost price to the Government and the selling price to the shipping companies, you could have bought all of them you wanted for a nickel apiece and the Government would have been glad to have been rid of them. Now, you want to take this $200,000,000 industry and subsidize it for the purpose of destroying a $29,000,000,000 industry in this country.

I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he had read the testimony of the Southern Pacific Railway officials as to these empty cars in which they stated they did not expect to add any mileage or any employees in the return of these cars.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I may say to the gentleman that I have not read the testimony, but 20 years' experience as a railroad man has taught me that most operating officials on the railroads today are not operating railroads from the offices of operating officials but are operating them from the back room of a bank or counting house.

Mr. COLDEN. I agree with that statement.

Mr. GRISWOLD. This bill does not "turn back the pages of time", as one gentleman suggested. It paves the way for the march of progress. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I am supporting this bill not only because I believe that its passage will be helpful to the State of New Jersey and to the Nation as a whole but for the further reason that it comes before us with the united support of the railroad labor organizations and innumerable railroad shippers and their organizations and railroad management. I also point out that this bill was favorably reported to the House by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee without a dissenting vote.

Testimony offered before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by national officers of the various railroad labor organizations clearly indicates that a very substantial increase in employment of railroad workers will likely follow the passage of this bill. George M. Harrison, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, appearing for the 21 standard railroad organizations, stated in his testimony that there are several hundred thousand unemployed railroad workers in the country today and that passage of this particular measure in its present form would very quickly take from relief rolls and place back upon railroad pay rolls many thousands of these good but now unemployed workers, most of whom are heads of families and have reached the age where it would be difficult, if not impossible, for them to obtain employment in other industries. No one can with exactness forecast the influence which expenditure of millions of dollars annually in increased pay rolls and for additional railway purchases of materials and supplies will have upon other industries, but it is safe to say that the effect will be very substantial, adding to the prosperity of retailers and wholesalers throughout the Nation and indirectly increasing employment in almost every trade and industry.

This in itself is sufficient reason for the enactment of this bill.

The bill proposes to change the long- and short-haul clause, which now forbids the railroads but not motor or water carriers, to charge less for a longer than for a shorter intermediate haul, although forced to do so by competition.

The law as it now stands and as administered by the Commission is a great handicap to American railroads and industries dependent upon the railroads. It has shackled the railroads in their efforts to adjust freight rates necessary to meet competition and move the products of industry, and has thus diverted a tremendous amount of traffic to other and usually subsidized forms of transportation, with heavy loss of railway revenue, less railroad employment, greatly diminished purchases of durable goods, and lessened the ability of the railways to pay taxes to support schools and other governmental functions.

A study made in 1933, showed that the railways paid $22,897,031 in taxes in New Jersey alone in 1930, of which approximately 51 percent was for public schools, 6.5 percent for highways, and 42.1 percent for other governmental purposes. Due to the depression and loss of traffic to other forms of transportation, railway taxes in New Jersey have been somewhat reduced since 1930, but have not been made up by other types of carriers. Coordinator Eastman recently found that railway taxes amount to approximately 8 cents per dollar of revenue as contrasted with less than 1 cent for water carriers and from 2 to 4 cents for motor carriers.

Furthermore, it is well known that railway investments in New Jersey aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars and amounts to many billions of dollars in the entire country. They employ thousands of men, and normally purchase durable goods produced not only in New Jersey industries but elsewhere in the Nation representing tremendous sums of money. [Applause.]

The evidence before the House subcommittee shows that between 1920 and 1930, 67 percent of the growth of the country was in zones within less than 100 miles of seacoasts, Gulf coast, and Great Lakes. Obviously, it is not to the advantage of the Nation, or even to the seacoast, Gulf or Great Lakes cities that the rest of the country should thus stagnate. The great industries cannot long exist on the business they market in such zones. They must find their markets everywhere throughout the country. To a considerable extent they must draw their raw materials from interior points by railroad, and they must have an adequate and efficient railway system. It is to their interests that the country as a whole should progress.

This is why representatives of industries located in Massachusetts, Chicago, Jacksonville, Tampa, and other places located on deep water, appeared before the House committee urging the passage of this bill. They do not fear that the bill will cripple or kill water transportation. New Jersey's interest is substantially similar to that of Massachusetts, and we find this statement coming from the transportation manager of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, located at Boston:

We do not believe that any one transportation agency should be given a monopoly or undue advantage through greater restriction of a competing agency.

We consider it quite probable, in the event this legislation is enacted, that in some instances manufacturers located on the seaboard or in proximity thereto will lose some advantages to their competitors at interior points. However, the railroads are essential for long-haul transportation and the movement of bulky traffic. Our dependency on them requires us to promote as much as possible their successful operations. As a shippers' organization, therefore, we view this subject from a broad, national standpoint.

The industries of Massachusetts and their employees are dependent on the railroads more than on other agencies for the transportation of food, fuel, and raw materials for manufacture; also for the outbound movement of manufactured goods to the important interior markets of the country.

It is essential that the railroads, the backbone of our transportation system and an important arm of our national defense, be permitted to function on a sound and profitable basis and adapt their rate structures to competitive requirements of commerce. This we are convinced can be better accomplished by the enactment of H. R. 3263.

Similar statements were made by representatives of Jacksonville and Tampa, Fla., both located on deep water, and by a representative of Chicago, on the Great Lakes, who spoke as the representative of the National Industrial Traffic League, an organization representing several hundred thousand industries and shippers throughout the country, including many located on navigable waters.

In the absence of compelling competition beyond the control of the railway at the competitive point, the practice of charging less for the longer than for the shorter haul cannot be justified, but, if because of unregulated competition, the business cannot be obtained except by a rate that will approach that of its competitor, and it becomes necessary to make a competitive rate which, while low, will yield more than the out-of-pocket cost of its handling, the railway is justified in making such reduction, subject, however, in the final analysis to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is the same rule in principle followed by every other industry and by every other type of carrier.

The situation was well described by James H. McCann, of Boston, Mass., representing the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, who said:

It has always been our view that the practice of the railroads to charge less for the longer than the intermediate shorter haul, when forced to do so by competition, rests upon a well-known economic principle. This principle is illustrated in industry. If a manufacturer, when his plant is not fully engaged, can secure a contract which will cover his actual out-of-pocket expense he can afford to take the contract at less than his regular price, because whatever profit there is goes to reduce his general overhead.

Furthermore, if a manufacturer meets competition in one market, but not in another, it is sound policy to lower the prices of his goods where such competition exists, provided the reduced prices cover out-of-pocket expenses and something more.

In the application of this principle to the railroads we believe they should be permitted to make rates low enough to meet competition. If these rates yield something more than the added cost of handling the traffic, they thereby contribute to the aggregate earnings and make possible reductions in the rates to intermediate points. Conversely, if the carriers are prohibited from meeting this competition they must forego the additional amount above the handling costs which such traffic would contribute, and must obtain their needed revenues from other traffic.

New Jersey, like other States on the seacoast, Gulf, or Great Lakes, is clearly interested in the continued maintenance of the water carriers serving its ports. But it is likewise heavily interested in its railways. Each form of transportation is entitled to share in the traffic available. Clearly no barrier, such as the present long- and short-haul clause, should be set up to prevent one form—the railways—from competing. The steamships now adjust their charges on such a basis as may be necessary to meet all-rail competition even though such charges may be less than they charge a shipper at an intermediate port through which such traffic may move. For example, steamships operating between the North Atlantic coast cities, on the one hand, and South Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific coast ports and to inland points contiguous thereto, reach out far into the interior and make such total charges as may be necessary to compete with the railways. They are not handicapped by any such thing as a long- and short-haul clause.

Mr. E. P. Farley, of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Line, who recently appeared before a Senate committee in connection with S. 4491, and who spoke for eight intercoastal water carriers, said:

The abnormally low (water) rates which have prevailed during the periods of rate wars have been of no real benefit to shippers, have drained the resources of all the lines, forcing some of them to withdraw from the trade, and have damaged the transcontinental railroads by extending water and rail shipments into the very center of the country, where economically there is no justification for the use of rail-and-water shipment in preference to the all-rail route.

The Commission, in administering the present long- and short-haul clause, has refused to grant the railways permission to establish rates necessary to hold even this business to the all-rail routes, although carriage by water route is conceded by water-carrier spokesmen to be without economic justification.

The question may reasonably be asked, Why should New Jersey and other railroads be estopped through the administration of a long- and short-haul clause from adjusting their rates to enable them to meet water competition where the water carriers fix the going rates? This does not mean that the railways must necessarily meet the exact charges of the water carriers. The quicker and more frequent rail service will usually permit a higher rail charge to be made. Where a water carrier desires to meet competition of a rail line it generally makes a charge somewhat less—for example, on the inland waterways the water carriers generally make their rates 80 percent of the rail rates. From New York to, say, Atlanta the water-and-rail rates are a certain number of cents—dependent upon the commodity—less than the all-rail rates. But when the water carrier chooses to fix the rate then the railways are effectively estopped from adjusting their rates to meet the competition unless they pay the penalty of making like reductions at intermediate places where the same competition does not exist. Common fairness demands that the two forms of transportation be treated alike; it is a poor rule that does not operate both ways.

This bill, if enacted, could not possibly cripple or eliminate water competition. It would prevent a water carrier monopoly of such traffic as the boats choose to handle. The water carriers would still be the rate-making carriers. The Commission, under section 3, would be bound to see that the railways make their rates no lower than absolutely necessary to meet the water competition and to obtain a fair share of the traffic. It would give the port cities a choice of routes—rail or water—whereas today the railways are entirely out of the picture, such as between the east and west coasts, where the spokesmen for water carriers boast that they have a practical monopoly of the traffic excepting only perishables.

Specifically, if this bill is enacted, the New Jersey railroads would be in a much better position than they are today in adjusting their rates necessary to meet the competition of water carriers to and from points on or adjacent to the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

In conclusion, I again express my belief that a bill such as this, which has the united support of the railroad labor organizations, shipping organizations, and railroad management, and which has been favorably reported to this House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce without a dissenting vote merits the favorable consideration of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, when I learn that a big campaign is being made to pass certain legislation, the first question that comes to my mind is, What is the reason for the campaign and what do those who furnish the propaganda hope to accomplish? In the light of this observation, I wish to state that I have seen, since I have been in this Congress, only one more powerful propaganda campaign for the passage of a bill than the one being waged for this so-called Pettengill bill. Its only propaganda rival was the effort to defeat the holding-company bill of last session—a more costly money campaign, but not more efficiently organized. I wonder why this campaign is being made for the repeal of this clause. Some group must expect to benefit or thinks it is being seriously injured by the present law.

This bill would repeal the fourth section of the Transportation Act. In plain words, the present law requires the carrier to charge no more for hauling a short distance than it charges for hauling a longer distance over the same line in the same direction. For instance, if a railroad carrier makes a certain rate from New York City to Portland, Oreg., under the present operation of the fourth section it is not allowed to charge more to take that freight to Boise, Idaho, or to LaGrande, Oreg., than is charged to Portland, Oreg. All interior points must now have rates no higher than the terminal rate.

What is wrong about that? Why has it called for such a campaign for change on the part of the railroads? Not only has this campaign been waged in the newspapers but by pamphlets, by speeches, by shrewd, able arguments of brilliant attorneys, and by the personal work of those who are employed in the railroad service. Perhaps railroad employees in the interior have been told that their jobs depend upon their getting letters and telegrams from shippers in those interior points asking for the repeal of the fourth section. Perhaps railroad men have been informed that they must be ardent supporters of the campaign for the repeal of the fourth section. So railroad employees have added to this propaganda, and many of them and their organizations have appeared to be convinced of the justice of the cause. I believe their own best interests are not involved in this change and that they will come to realize the fact. They are themselves victims of propaganda.

My district is entirely an interior district. It has no terminal points. Every shipping point in the district would be adversely affected by the passage of the Pettengill bill, and still lumbermen, merchants, and others have written and petitioned me to vote for the Pettengill bill. When I send my argument to them they change their minds and so notify me. I am then convinced they must have been misled, or else I have not been able properly to visualize the situation.

This campaign has cost an immense sum of money. Somebody has paid for it, or is going to pay for it, and that somebody is expecting to get that money back manyfold if this bill is passed.

The hope held out to railroad men is that it will increase traffic, it will require more trains, more men will be employed. Is that the history of the last 10 years? Nearly one-half of the railroad men who were employed 12 years ago have been retired from service on account of larger engines, as a result of so-called efficiency changes, or because of a general weeding out of employees. Are they going to change their tactics? Do the railroad men believe that overnight the men who dictate railroad policies will act to increase their employees? Will they not, rather, continue the same old policy of reducing numbers of employees?

Can traffic be increased? Not materially. Why? Pipe lines have come, and come to stay. The airplanes are here, and here to stay. The private automobile and the truck are here to stay. These are the things that have cut railroad traffic in half, and there is nothing in the repeal of the fourth section that is going to stay the steady march of the internal-combustion engine operated in the truck and automobile. Invention shifts the business of transporting freight and passengers. Water transportation was developed as a reaction to excessively high railway freight rates. Shall we deliberately destroy the enormous investments in inland waterway improvements made by this Government?

The object of this bill—H. R. 3263—is, we are told, to enable the railroads to make special rates between port terminals, so that they will get at least part of the business now going by water through the Panama Canal. The railroads cannot compete with water transportation, and for the simple reason that it is cheaper to load freight on a ship in New York and float it on the water to Portland, Oreg., than it is to put that same freight in cars and haul it over the rails 3,000 miles to Portland, Oreg. If the railroads make a rate that will divert that water traffic largely to the rails, then it must be at a rate which will cause them to lose money on the traffic. The managers of railroads have never been noted as philanthropists in the conduct of their business. They have apparently been guided and ruled by the principle enunciated by the elder Vanderbilt, "Charge all the traffic will bear. The public be damned."

Now, if that terminal rate is made so that there is a loss the money must be made up somewhere. Railroads will reimburse themselves for that money loss as well as money paid for the propaganda that has been put on to pass this bill. They evidently hope also to reap other rich rewards. Who will be called upon to foot the bill? Why, of course, the shipper from points for which there is no competition, where the railroads have and must have all the traffic. There they can charge up to the point of confiscation. Clearly it is the interior points that must suffer. Have they suffered in the past? They certainly have. Anyone who ever lived in interior places like Spokane, Salt Lake, Denver, Boise, or my eastern Oregon knows full well the wrongs suffered before the Congress inserted in the law what we know as the fourth section, which the railroads now seek to repeal. Shippers from these places have paid the through rate on freight from the Atlantic coast to the port terminal, and then the celebrated short-haul freight back to the interior point.

A few years ago I was the chief owner and manager of an electric power company in eastern Oregon. I needed quick shipment on a car of copper to be used 330 miles east of Portland. I knew the manager of the railroad and went to visit him at his office in Portland. He made arrangements for the car of copper to be shipped from the company in New Jersey, by rail, to Portland, Oreg. The freight was a little more than $700. I then told the manager that I wanted to take the car of copper off the train when it came through North Powder, 330 miles east of Portland, as I was anxious to use it immediately. The manager said, "I will be glad to do that for you, but it will be necessary for you to pay the freight back to North Powder from Portland, and that is $480." So I paid, in fact, a little more than $1,200 on that car of copper wire. When it came to North Powder it was sidetracked, at my request, never taking the joy ride to Portland and back, for which I paid. I was out that $480 more than a man would have paid had he been buying the copper for use in Portland, Oreg., 330 miles farther on. Of course, I read that $480 freight into the capitalization of the company; and when I sold out it went into the capitalization of the new company; and users of electricity in the Grande Ronde Valley are still paying interest upon that $480. That amount measured the extent to which I was penalized for living in a territory where the railroad was allowed to charge more for a short haul than they charged for a long haul.

Everyone in my section helped pay these extra freight costs. All of the freight that was paid on materials that went into the buildings and other structures in the great interior country paid that extra charge over the terminal points. Growers were penalized on all the wheat and livestock shipped. Interior lumbermen could not sell as much to farmers whose resources were drained by such rates. Spokane suffered, Denver suffered; and I cannot see for the life of me how any Congressman from the great interior can vote for a bill which will be so harmful to the district which he represents. Everyone interested in retaining some small measure of prosperity for our interior country should study this matter and think what would happen to our inland empire if their railroad rates were materially increased.

The proponents of the bill say they have no desire to raise the freight rates for the interior. Why, then, the great effort to pass this? They say, "Why cannot we lower the rates between terminals and fill the empty boxcars now going west?" We say, "Fill those empty boxcars now with freight. We do not care if you are going to haul freight for nothing to Portland, Oreg.; but then we want the same privilege in the interior." Turn it over, upside down, and look at the proposition from any angle. It certainly means disaster to interior points, and it means that the railroad management expects to get more money. If they were not going to get more money, they would not be making this tremendous fight for the passage of the bill. The interior country noncompetitive points have never received any relief from confiscatory freight rates except by reason of competition. The truck and the automobile were a great boon to the interior. Motor trucks are now transporting freight, such as gasoline, from Pacific terminals as far as 500 miles into the interior. Where trucking is possible there is great relief from the excessive freight rates that were formerly charged. The railroad management's greatest interest is to get more traffic, more freight, more money. Railway revenues are increasing and the railroads have been enjoying a period of real prosperity. They have always had Government aid and encouragement; loans at low rates of interest, and concessions given few other industries. It is argued that this repeal would put more railroad employees back to work and would increase their purchasing power, thus aiding communities. I believe it would injure more communities than it would help. I wish to see railway employees well paid but do not believe this bill will prove of ultimate value to them.

I know the plea is made that railroads pay large taxes, and this is played up strongly in the press of interior points. Where do the taxes come from? They come from the people. The railroad is simply the collecting agency. What have been the reasons for difficult financial circumstances railroads have faced? Overcapitalization has been an important factor. Then more modern methods of transportation are today competing in the field. Instead of taking their losses like other business men, railroads seek to force the public to make good to them these inevitable financial losses. Of course, railroad lines cannot compete with pipe lines for carrying oil.

Then, too, railroads have never taken the deflation that all other business, especially agriculture, and property, have taken. My farm, at one time worth $200 an acre, has fallen in value so that, if it could be sold at all, it would probably not be worth more than $50 an acre. Have the railroads reduced their capital structure? Are they not still trying to pay interest and dividends capitalized at a time when all sorts of financial schemes and plans were worked, in the formation of railroad companies? And why, I ask, should the people who live in the interior be compelled to make good to the Wall Street bankers, who control the railroads, the losses they have sustained by reason of great modern conveniences like the truck and the motor car?

The Interstate Commerce Commission has declared against repeal of the long- and short-haul clause and has stated that it should be continued in force to insure the protection of the shipping public. It assumes that repeal would result in the establishment of higher rates for shorter hauls than for longer hauls, and in the same discriminations which were ruinous to interior points before this protective legislation was enacted. It will seriously handicap our shippers. Railroad Coordinator Eastman, who has been making special study of measures essential to railway prosperity, does not recommend the repeal. He said, in a statement before the Rules Committee of the House, that under the fourth section the Interstate Commerce Commission is now authorized to grant proper relief to the railroads in meeting competition, but it must be proved that the rates they fix are compensatory in nature. Under this provision of the act the Interstate Commerce Commission has granted the petitions of the railroads for relief in about 150 cases. About 30 applications have been refused by the Commission. Is not that a fair showing? In all fairness, what more do the railroads want? In common decency, what more do they have the right to ask? This bill shifts the burden from the carrier to the shipper in presenting a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we all know how impossible it is for the shipper to get together the money, hire the attorneys, and make the presentation of the case before this Commission.

If any Member of Congress wonders what will happen if this bill becomes a law, I ask such a colleague to read the letter written by L. W. Childress to Judge Driver. You have a copy of that letter. It was sent to you. In that letter Mr. Childress gives a detailed description of the fight that is being made by the railroads against water transportation on the Mississippi. From his statement it appears clear that for years the railways have waged a most relentless war of rate cutting to ruin and break down the barge lines. The proponents of this bill seem to think the managers of the rails have turned over a new leaf, that they are good now, and that they will not resort to any of the methods used so freely by their predecessors a few years ago. The managers, they seem to think, have reformed and will not adopt the ruthless and unjust methods of cut rates to terminals if this bill becomes a law. Forsooth, they say, "We have the Interstate Commerce Commission." Again I call to your attention Mr. Childress' letter and ask you to see how the men of Wall Street have resorted to any and every means to ruin the investment of millions upon millions that the Government has made to give relief in the Mississippi Valley from the confiscatory railroad rates.

Do not believe their fairy stories for a single minute. The rails want revenue and still more revenue. Should this bill become a law, down go rates to terminals to break the lines that are now carrying freight by water. The money to replenish the losses sustained must come from somewhere. It is surely not coming out of the reserves that the banks have. It will come from increased rates for all intermediate points, rates just as high as the traffic will bear. The water lines will be ruined and the railroad lines will be left charging higher rates.

The rails have yielded on their excessive confiscatory rates only to one argument, and that is competition. That is why this Government had to invest so many millions in improving river waterways and harbors, to force down rail rates. Do we want to wreck all that investment? They say that they just want to get a little of the freight that is now being water-borne. If they got it all it would only increase the total amount of the freight that they now carry by less than 1 percent.

The author of the bill, in his opening statement, said that wheat could not be moved out of the Pacific Northwest into the Southeast to compete with wheat from Argentina. That statement leaves a false impression. The fact of the case is that wheat now, and for months, has been as high in Argentina as it is in the southern parts of the United States. The only wheat which can come in, unless it is smuggled in, is the wheat that comes in as feed, carrying an ad valorem tariff of 10 percent of value. If it comes in as milling wheat, it must pay 42 cents tariff, which is impossible. I will tell my colleague from Indiana why wheat cannot move out of the Pacific Northwest. It is on account of the confiscatory railroad rates. I live 300 miles east of tidewater. At the beginning of the great World War we paid a freight rate on wheat from my ranch to tidewater of 9 cents a bushel. We now pay almost 16 cents. Then another 15 cents will take that wheat to Galveston, New Orleans, or Baltimore. Why cannot it be shipped directly east by rail? A rate of 42 cents a bushel from my ranch to the Missouri River. That is why. That same wheat can be sent by rail twice the distance in Canada for less than one-half the money. The rails collect more freight from pears, apples, and cherries shipped from the Pacific Northwest than the growers receive gross for the fruit over which they have labored days, months, and years to produce.

I am opposed to this bill because it would have ruinous effects upon agriculture. The farmer is the man who would be called upon to finance the rate wars in which the railroads would engage if this measure should pass. The great general farm organizations of the country are all against this bill and realize the iniquities that would follow its enactment. As the National Grange well says:

This kind of legislation would drive industry to the seacoast and depopulate the interior of the country. It would remove the farmers' market farther and farther from him and increase his cost of doing business.

The farmer lives in the interior. The farmer is the intermediate shipper. The farmer is the man who is located at the noncompetitive point, and the farmer is the man who would have to pay the bill in the form of exorbitant freight rates to finance the railroads in a rate war with other carriers.

Railroads, whose trains move through the interior farming country, cannot prosper unless farmers are prosperous. They have just as great a stake in agriculture as has the farmer, but they do not seem to realize it. When farm prices are low railroad earnings are low. Farm prices are up a little, and the roads are buying new equipment.

There is no claim made that the passage of this bill would be in the public interest. It is admitted that it is designed to help only the railroads. It would seriously handicap shipping and cripple motor and water transportation. This bill violates that sound principle which should govern us in the enactment of all legislation, namely, "the greatest good for the greatest number."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 22 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I happen to be a member of the subcommittee which sat patiently while we held the hearings on this long- and short-haul bill, introduced by our colleague [Mr. PETTENGILL] of Indiana. I compliment and pay my respects to the chairman of the committee and all of the other members of the committee. I believe they have tried to consider impartially this legislation purely and simply upon its merits, in an endeavor to solve and help the railroads with their problems at the present time. I differed quite materially on the point of view which my colleagues arrived at. I do not believe there is any question at all but that the railroads need relief, but I am thoroughly convinced that under present section 4 of the law, as it is on the statute books at the present time, the Interstate Commerce Commission could, if it is so minded, extend all the relief that the railroads request, without any change whatsoever in the amendment, and it was quite generally presented to us at the hearing that it was in a sense the niggardly attitude taken by the Commission toward the railroads which necessitated their coming before Congress to secure relief.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I decline to yield now. I shall be glad to yield a little later. I do not want to see anything happen to railroad legislation that we have already enacted. I do not want to see this go so far that you will nullify and vacate from the statute books all of this tremendous volume of judicial opinions and decisions by various courts, even the Supreme Court of the United States, which opinions have had a tremendous bearing on the formulating and carrying out of the railroad policy of the United States.

I am in thorough sympathy with every member of my committee, and I shall recommend to the House that the railroads be given some relief, but I would hate to see the section entirely eliminated from the statute. It is true the bill gives the railroads of the country an opportunity to meet competition by other modes of transportation, by filing their rates, which means, of course, that the rates on the transcontinental traffic handled by the railroads will be reduced.

Whether or not they can handle that with their present equipment and personnel, or whether they will require additional equipment and personnel is another question, but we know that it will add to the expense of whatever traffic they carry.

It will be remembered that it was only in the closing days of the last session that we passed the Motor Carrier Act. That was before this bill had been reported to the House, but the committee on the long and short haul has recommended it to the House. We have a moral obligation because we passed that Motor Carrier Act. The reason it was passed was to elevate the standard of the motor-truck industry—those carriers by motor truck who were dealing in interstate traffic as common and contract carriers. And what did that Motor Carrier Act do? It compelled every common carrier, every contract carrier in interstate traffic to file its rates with the Commission, and we were in hopes that not only the motor-truck carriers would be elevated so that they would get a greater return for their services in the community, and more pay for the goods they carry, but also that it would help take away from the railroads some of the unfair competition with which they have had to contend these many years through individual motor-truck operators. After these rates are filed, under the Motor Carrier Act, the Commission can on its own motion readjust any of those rates that are unfair. So I feel from that point we should take into consideration that these motor carriers have to file their rates and that they are subject to rules and regulations on whether the rates are fair or not; whereas under the Pettengill bill you will throw the doors wide open, allowing the railroads to go ahead and get what business they can at such price as they can, to help out the railroad problem. I believe there is some justification in the railroads' request for relief, and just as soon as the bill is read for amendment I shall offer as an amendment the recommendations by Coordinator Eastman, known before our committee as the Rayburn bill.

What does that do? The Rayburn bill is, in substance, paragraph 1 of section 4, until it comes to the question of the 1910 amendment. The Rayburn bill actually strikes out of section 4 as it is now on the statute books, following section 1, the following:

But in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the Commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from a more distant point than is not reasonably compensatory for the services performed, if a circuitous rail line of road is, because of its circuitry, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points.

That is known as the equidistant rule in relation to section 4.

Without reading the balance of that paragraph, it also strikes out "on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence." Now, if you strike out "reasonably compensatory", the equidistant provision and the potential water possibilities not in existence, you are eliminating from this bill the three controversial points which, in all probability, have been the cause and the reason why there has not been more relief extended to the railroads on their request for relief under the fourth section. Still I am firmly of the belief and opinion that any of these requests of the railroads, as they have been made in the past, under the present phraseology and language of section 4, could have been granted.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. Did not Mr. Eastman, in his appearance before the Rules Committee, advocate the adoption of the Rayburn bill and speak against the adoption of the Pettengill bill?

Mr. HOLMES. I do not know what Mr. Eastman said before the Rules Committee.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman was not present?

Mr. HOLMES. I was not present. I do know, however, that no member of the Interstate Commerce Commission appeared before our subcommittee at any time while these hearings were in progress to state their views on this question.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is it not a fact that if this bill is passed the Commission still has the right to reject any schedules filed by the railroads?

Mr. HOLMES. That is true; and while there is a sort of face-saving clause in the Pettengill bill, which provides that the railroads must prove their case, you are placing the burden of the complaint on the shipper; and if I, as a small manufacturer in the city of Worcester, ship goods to other parts of the United States, that burden is placed upon me.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But you are not taking anything away from the Commission. The Commission still has the same power.

Mr. HOLMES. They have, under section 3, certain powers.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It only limits the time. That is all it means. There is a limited time in which they must give their decision. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. No. I think my colleague is wrong to feel that his is the only object of the bill. I can assure the gentleman that the responsibility will be placed on the shipper to originally make complaint. The railroads, with their tremendous organization and their facilities, can at the present time, even with the amendment I have proposed, file their schedules so that the shipper throughout the United States will have some general knowledge of what those rates are. The Commission would have some valid reason to either approve or reject those rates without secretly filing them in Washington, where a shipper up in Massachusetts or out in Oregon would have no knowledge before the bill for the freight is rendered to him. The average small shipper is not in a position to hire lawyers.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They have 30 days under the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. They have 30 days.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And then they have 7 months afterward.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. Not just now. I believe the railroads should be relieved, and I want to make the fourth section just as flexible as possible, but I believe the railroads should file their rates and any proposed changes that they want to make, because they always maintain their rate experts, their attorneys, and every other facility where they can prepare within any reasonable time the necessary request for a change of rates either one way or the other; but the shipper is not situated that way. I am afraid that this legislation, wiping out altogether this section, is going to simply throw that burden on the shippers of the United States.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But if they submit a rate now, must not the shippers oppose that rate and prove that it is not reasonable? Today if the railroad makes a request to the Commission, is it not necessary for the shippers to protest?

Mr. HOLMES. Oh, yes; if they do not like the rate, of course.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But what will be the difference? The only thing is that under this bill there is a limited time.

Mr. HOLMES. No. There is no limit of time in this bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes. They must give a decision within 7 months, I think somebody said. There must be a decision handed down in 7 months.

Mr. HOLMES. On the question of the reasonableness of the rate?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. But there is all that time. Those rates were made available to the public so they could find out what they were. The shipper is the one who has got to make the complaint if he does not agree to the rate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does the gentleman have any doubt but what they will know?

Mr. HOLMES. There is no question whether they will know.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does the gentleman believe the railroads should be placed in strait jackets with the shippers allowed to do as they feel like?

Mr. HOLMES. No; I do not believe that is a fair question.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is what is happening today.

Mr. HOLMES. I think that is an unfair question from my colleague, knowing him as well as I do. I certainly want to give the railroads all the advantage they are entitled to within reason. At the same time I think we are going a little too far if in amending the law to give them relief we do not require them to file their rates with the Commission in the proper way.

An examination of the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission discloses hundreds and hundreds of decisions in rate and valuation cases, many of them bearing on section 4. In my opinion, around these decisions has been developed—not only by the Federal Government but through our various State public-utility commissions—rules for guidance of counties, States, and the Federal Government in their railroad problems. I think this procedure has been built up beneficially to the railroad interests because of this litigation and these decisions. It has resulted in sound railroad management with a definite policy of trying to serve the country. I am afraid that if we eliminate section 4 altogether, we will be taking out of the record this tremendous amount of work that has been done through litigation bringing about certain standards of railroad management.

Reference was made by my colleague about the attitude of the Massachusetts Organization of Associated Industries. The traffic committee of this organization is on record as being in favor of this bill, but many individual members of the organization have registered their personal objection to the bill. This has no bearing on it, for in my opinion, as a matter of fact, as a citizen of Massachusetts and a New Englander, it will not result in relief for our railroads. So I am not speaking here because I am trying selfishly to hold something in my district or trying selfishly to get something for my district, because it will not affect New England or New England railroads one iota, and we probably will not get a pound of additional tonnage one way or the other, whether this bill is adopted or not; but I am seriously conscious of the fact that there is an element of danger when you go too far in trying to do a good deed. It may kick back at you and do the reverse of what you expect; it may create tremendous hardships.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman tell us what the Associated Industries of Massachusetts consist of?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes; I shall be very glad to. The Associated Industries of Massachusetts is an organization of manufacturers from various sections of the State.

Mr. PETTENGILL. About 1,100 of them?

Mr. HOLMES. About 1,100.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And they are on record in favor of this bill?

Mr. HOLMES. Not by record of the association. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lucas].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, under the laws of the State of Illinois the Illinois tax commission has jurisdiction over the assessments of railroad property for tax purposes. As chairman of that commission for 2 years, I was given the opportunity of obtaining first-hand knowledge of the railroads, their facilities, their capitalized earning power, the value of their stocks, bonds, and rolling stocks, as all of these factors were used by the commission in determining the fair cash value of the railroad property.

We had under our jurisdiction 92 railroads. Each railroad, under the law, was compelled to prepare various schedules under oath which gave the commission a complete picture of their business and financial standing for the current year. In 1933 the commission held hearings for 4 weeks, listening to testimony and arguments of the representatives of 57 railroad companies which had filed with the clerk of the commission objections to their respective assessments. My colleagues, the financial condition of the great majority of those one-time healthy structures was appalling, to say the least. Receiver after receiver had been appointed, equipment was impaired, the railroad stock had deteriorated, the market value of many issues of stock and bonds had almost collapsed, the morale of those in control was low. In some cases about all that was left was two iron streaks of rust running for miles through the country. Never in my career as a lawyer for 20 years at the bar did I examine a set of facts that had so much disaster written upon almost every schedule. Never in my long legal career did I listen to such sincere and sound legal arguments upon the issue before us. The statistician, the tax expert, and the lawyer all pleaded with enthusiasm and firmness, yet at times with pathos, for a substantial reduction of the tentative assessed valuation fixed by the commission.

We finally certified an assessment of $492,000,000 for 1933, compared with $710,000,000 in 1927. In 6 years the fair cash value of railroad property in Illinois for taxation purposes had decreased approximately 70 percent. Even with this startling decrease in value, only two States had a larger assessment in 1933. And these railroads the tax commission investigated consisted of railroads operating between Chicago and the Atlantic coast, railroads which operated between Chicago and the Gulf, and railroads which operated between Chicago and the Pacific coast, as well as railroads which operated within our own State.

My colleagues, these hearings developed additional information which bears directly upon the question before us. Railroads, on the whole, with the greatest spread in mileage and fortified and equipped for long hauls, showed the greatest and most consistent earning power. It was agreed in those hearings by the railroad experts that the local railroad with a limited base in mileage and facility is doomed. It cannot compete with the various other transportation agencies which have come into existence in the last few years. The railroads with the long haul of freight are the saviors of the industry. They are the only ones which can survive the onrushing and industrious challenge of their transportation competitors.

In the discussion before us the inland waterways of the Midwest have been mentioned. Nine of the counties in my congressional district border on the Illinois River, and two of them border on the Mississippi River. Obviously, I am interested in the cheap rates of transportation which are and will be afforded through barge operation upon those rivers. However, this bill being debated today will in no way affect that situation.

My experience as a member of the Illinois Tax Commission has convinced me that no opportunity should be overlooked to lend a helping hand at every available opportunity to safeguard the most important industry of its kind in America. Let us not forget that the railroad of yesterday, with all of its baneful, corrupt, and nefarious influences, is not the railroad of today. Without doubt the passage of this bill is a direct help to the railroads that should survive. This is the hour in the Nation's recovery to give every gesture of encouragement toward the rehabilitation of the railroads of America. I am glad to support the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE].

Mr. REECE. Mr. Chairman, I support this bill because I am convinced that its enactment is in the national interest, regardless of any sectional interest North, South, East, or West.

As a member of the House subcommittee which heard the voluminous testimony of many persons, both for and against the bill, as well as from independent studies I have made regarding the practical operation and effect of the present long- and short-haul clause, I came to the very definite conclusion that while at first reading the present clause might seem reasonable, in actual practice it not only fails to serve any reasonable purpose but is a positive detriment to the industrial progress of the whole country and should therefore be repealed.

Especially is this true when we consider that since the present clause was enacted in 1910 and amended in 1920, we have greatly strengthened the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of reasonable and non-discriminatory rates, including the power to suspend rates for 7 months pending investigation and to then allow or disapprove such rates; also the power not only to fix maximum rates but to prescribe minimum rates. Under this power there need be no fear that the Commission would permit the railways to establish or to continue rates that are lower than absolutely necessary to meet the competition of other forms of transportation and to obtain a fair share of the available traffic should this bill be adopted. The change effected by the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause is a procedural change only, and does not deprive the Commission of any of the various powers it now possesses with respect to reasonable and nondiscriminatory rates, or any of the possible abuses to which other speakers have referred. The Commission may still suspend or set a new rate, and the burden of proof in justifying the competitive rate continues to rest upon the railways.

As has been pointed out, contrary to perhaps the popular impression, this is not strictly a railroad bill, although it is strongly urged and supported by not only railway management but by the rank and file of railway employees who have seen traffic diverted from the rails, employment and purchases diminished, because the rails have been prevented by the Commission, operating under the present act, from meeting competition as they find it, within reasonable limits, of course.

I have said it is not strictly a railroad bill. It is one initiated by the National Industrial Traffic League, representing several hundreds of thousands of industries and shippers throughout the country who have seen industry, particularly in the interior, drying up under the operation of the clause. They have seen the railways, willing and anxious to establish rates necessary to move traffic and enable industry to progress and the country as a whole to grow, prevented from establishing such rates either without months and sometimes years of delay and in many, many instances refused permission to do so at all. And here I wish to make reference to Mr. Eastman's testimony before the Rules Committee in regard to the number of applications received, decided, and the average length of time of 28 days that elapsed between the filing of the application and the Commission's decision. A very large number of these applications are largely of a mechanical nature in connection with decisions of the Commission where, to put the basis required by the Commission into effect is impossible, without obtaining fourth-section relief. Others are of very minor consequence and a very large proportion of the total are applications in connection with which it is simply a question as between the Commission on the one hand and the railroads on the other in the respect that the public is not concerned in whether relief be granted or otherwise. They are largely to take care of technical tariff situations.

Where there is any opposition whatsoever to the granting of relief, the situation is entirely dissimilar in the respect that these applications are long delayed between the time that the application was originally filed and the final decision obtained. This was clearly indicated by the hearings and I wish to refer to a few specific examples:

GRAIN FROM EAST ST. LOUIS, CAIRO, AND MEMPHIS TO FLORIDA PORTS

Application filed May 19, 1933, decided November 1934.

Authority: Page 89 record hearing before subcommittee of the Committee of the House on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

RATES FROM CENTRAL WESTERN TERRITORY TO SOUTH ATLANTIC AND FLORIDA PORTS

Application filed September 12, 1929.

Fourth section, order no. 11427, entered August 24, 1932, practically 3 years after filing.

Basis of relief granted impractical of application.

New application filed January 13, 1933, and denial issued to request for elimination of restrictions, making working out impractical, was entered November 13, 1933. Finally worked out with representatives of Commission and steamship lines so that rates were made effective December 15, 1934—5 years and 3 months after original application was filed.

Authority: Record of hearing before subcommittee, pages 89 and 90.

SUGAR

Transcontinental Lines filed fourth-section application April 24, 1930.

Hearing held January 12, 1931.

Proposed report issued June 26, 1931.

Application denied by the Commission August 3, 1932.

Applicants filed petition for rehearing and reconsideration August 23, 1932.

Commission reopened case for reargument and reconsideration December 12, 1932.

Commission rendered a decision granting relief in principle, but fixed a minimum rate, which would make relief of little value, although it would have been effective in meeting the competition as of the date of the original hearing. This decision was rendered July 3, 1933, 3 years and 2 months after filing.

Authority: Record before subcommittee, pages 150-151.

Filed March 8, 1930. Submitted October 7, 1931. Decided April 11, 1932.

COMMODITIES BETWEEN NEW ORLEANS AND TEXAS POINTS—NO. 15394

Submitted July 6, 1934; decided November 11, 1935.

SWITCHING AND OTHER ACCESSORIAL CHARGES—NO. 14939

Submitted July 13, 1933; decided February 14, 1936.

Southeastern carriers had 10 applications filed prior to 1934 which had not been decided February 1, 1935.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REECE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETTENGILL. In one case a fourth-section application was pending for 11 years?

Mr. REECE. It was so stated before the subcommittee during the hearings.

Let me give you an illustration of how this present long- and short-haul clause works out in practical operation, and I will use my own State of Tennessee. In the eastern section we have a vegetable-canning industry of considerable size, furnishing employment to hundreds of workers, and using the crops of tomatoes, beans, corn, and so forth, produced by farmers in that section.

For many years these canneries had a profitable market along the Gulf coast. There they met the competition of many other canners, including those using water transportation. It was a healthy competition for both shippers and consumers, giving all a wide choice of products and markets. This has largely been changed under the operation of the long- and short-haul clause as it now reads, this because the railways have been compelled to withdraw the old competitive rates to these water-competitive markets.

To be specific, Newport, Tenn., in my district, is a representative east Tennessee canning point. The competitive rate on canned goods established to meet competition, not present at intermediate points, was formerly 48 cents per 100 pounds to New Orleans. This rate has now been advanced to 64 cents, an increase of 33½ percent. The Commission says that 64 cents is a reasonable maximum rate from Newport to New Orleans. The rates grade down with distance at intermediate points. Such a rate adjustment may look pretty on paper, but if a 64-cent rate to New Orleans is too high to meet the competition, the Newport canner finds it is as good as no rate at all. The railways and the east Tennessee canners are thereby ousted from the market.

Much the same thing is true of rates on canned goods from Newport to Houston and Galveston where the rate has been increased from 83 to 95 cents under this "dry land" basis of making rates, which is to ignore water and other competitive conditions actually present, and which no industry other than the railways is compelled by law either to ignore or to have such competition set the price on all of the goods it markets.

What I have said as to east Tennessee canned goods is not peculiar to my State. A representative of 70 canneries in Iowa and Nebraska appeared before our committee and urgently requested that this bill be passed in order that the products of his people might again be marketed under rates that would move the traffic. This gentleman told the committee that the same situation exists as to canners in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Colorado. This gentleman, Mr. Lampman, made this significant statement:

It (meaning the long- and short-haul clause) has ceased to be a matter of speculation so far as our rates to these highly competitive points are concerned. We must have relief or forfeit the business to our competitors who are favorably situated adjacent to water transportation. There is no large consuming center close to our canneries; we must ship to distant points; we cannot move our fields, therefore, relief through rail carriers is our salvation.

Thus we find a most anomalous situation—industry in the interior gradually drying up, the shippers and railways in agreement as to what is necessary to move the traffic, but the railways with plants costing billions of dollars and not operated to capacity standing by helpless to promptly act, or, in many cases, denied authority to act unless they are willing to apply the same rates to other places where the same highly competitive conditions do not exist and where to do so the loss of revenue would be ruinous, greater than that to be gained from the transportation of the traffic to the competitive points which, if it is to be handled at all, must be on a low measure of profit.

What is true of canned goods is true of many other commodities such as potatoes from Idaho, Colorado, Nebraska, and Minnesota; paper from Wisconsin and Minnesota; iron and steel from Pittsburgh, Youngstown, Chicago, Kansas City, and Colorado; cast-iron pipe from Utah; rice from Arkansas; wool, hides, and tallow from the intermountain States; lumber from the Pacific and Gulf coasts; beet sugar from Colorado, Montana, and so forth; petroleum from independent interior refineries. Many other similar situations were brought to the committee's attention. What we have seen is a gradual stripping of traffic from the railways and a drying up of industry.

This is why we have seen the country as a whole increase 16.1 percent in population during the prosperous period from 1920 to 1930, while many States, suffering from the adverse effects of this long- and short-haul clause, have languished. Witness the following as contrasted with a growth of 16.1 percent of the United States as a whole:

Montana: Decrease of 2.1 percent.

Idaho: Increase of 3 percent.

Eastern Washington: Decrease of nine-tenths of 1 percent.

Eastern Oregon: Decrease of 1.8 percent.

Arkansas: Increase of 5.8 percent.

Minnesota: Increase of 7.4 percent.

Iowa: Increase of 2.8 percent.

Missouri: Increase of 6.6 percent.

North Dakota: Increase of 5.3 percent.

South Dakota: Increase of 8.8 percent.

Nebraska: Increase of 6.3 percent.

Kansas: Increase of 6.3 percent.

South Carolina: Increase of 3.3 percent.

Georgia: Four-tenths of 1 percent.

Kentucky: 8.2 percent.

Tennessee: Increase of 11.9 percent.

These are the States that have suffered most from the operation of this long- and short-haul clause, depriving, as it has, their industries from the opportunity of marketing their products freely in competition with water-borne commodities, and by likewise depriving the railways of the transportation of such traffic, with all that this means in the way of lessened employment and purchases and ability to pay taxes to support schools and other governmental functions.

The question of taxes paid by railways versus water carriers is important. A report by Federal Coordinator Eastman released in May 1935 shows that in 1932, as to the numerous water carriers who reported, their taxes represented nine-tenths of 1 cent per dollar of revenue, while those of the railways were 8 cents per dollar of revenue. The 12 intercoastal water carriers operating via the Panama Canal paid a total of $20,000 in taxes, or one-half of 1 percent of their revenues.

Of the railway taxes paid, approximately 46 percent goes to the support of schools, 14 percent to public highways, and 40 percent to other governmental purposes. But few water carriers pay taxes anywhere on their floating property.

The evidence before the committee shows that between 1920 and 1930, 67 percent of the growth of the country was in zones within 50 miles of the seacoasts and Great Lakes. Obviously it is not to the advantage of the Nation or even to these seacoast cities that the rest of the country should thus stagnate. The great industries located on or adjacent to the seacoasts and Great Lakes cannot long exist on the business they market in such zones. They must find their markets everywhere throughout the country. To a considerable extent they must draw their raw materials from interior points by railroad, and they must have an adequate and efficient railway system. It is to their best interests that the country as a whole should progress, as it did by leaps and bounds prior to the enactment of the present long- and short-haul clause, when the railways were able to freely and promptly establish rates necessary to move the traffic of the country.

This is why representatives of industries located in Massachusetts, Chicago, Jacksonville, Tampa, and other places located on deep water appeared before us urging the passage of this bill. They do not fear that the bill will cripple or kill water transportation. Listen to this statement coming from the transportation manager of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, located at Boston:

We consider it quite probable, in the event this legislation is enacted, that in some instances manufacturers located on the seaboard or in proximity thereto will lose some advantages to their competitors at interior points. However, the railroads are essential for long-haul transportation and the movement of bulky traffic. Our dependency on them requires us to promote as much as possible their successful operations. As a shippers' organization, therefore, we view this subject from a broad, national standpoint.

The industries of Massachusetts and their employees are dependent on the railroads more than on other agencies for the transportation of food, fuel, and raw materials for manufacture, also for the outbound movement of manufactured goods to the important interior markets of the country.

It is essential that the railroads, the backbone of our transportation system and an important arm of our national defense, be permitted to function on a sound and profitable basis and adopt their rate structures to competitive requirements of commerce.

Similar representations were made by spokesmen of Jacksonville and Tampa, Fla., both located on deep water.

I quote from a recent telegram from the Nashville Chamber of Commerce in my own State, addressed to the Speaker of the House:

In our opinion this measure would be largely to the advantage of business in this territory.

Some of the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the water carriers in opposition to the bill made the point that the railroads have available a great deal of inland traffic not open to water competition and that the water carriers are practically restricted to traffic between water ports. Such is not the case for several reasons.

First, the great bulk of the traffic handled by water carriers originates or terminates at inland points and is moved to or from the ports by means of short rail or motor-truck hauls. The existing strictly port-to-port traffic admittedly could not support the water carriers. In this connection, I want to quote from testimony of E. P. Farley, who recently appeared before a Senate committee in connection with S. 4491 and who spoke for eight intercoastal water carriers:

The abnormally low water rates which have prevailed during the periods of rate wars have been of no real benefit to shippers, have drained the resources of all the lines, forcing some of them to withdraw from the trade, and have damaged the transcontinental railroads by extending water and rail shipments into the very center of the country where economically there is no justification for the use of rail-and-water shipment in preference to the all-rail route.

Second, much of this so-called, non-water-competitive traffic is not available to many of the railways who have had much of their traffic diverted to water carriers. The heavy tonnage of coal moved from Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and eastern Kentucky to the ports on the Great Lakes and Atlantic Ocean and elsewhere by such lines as the Pennsylvania, Chesapeake & Ohio, and Norfolk & Western, or iron ore by the Great Northern, mean nothing to lines such as the Atlantic Coast Line and Seaboard Air Line operating along the Atlantic Coast, the Illinois Central and Missouri Pacific operating along the Mississippi River, or the Southern Pacific or Santa Fe operating across the Continental Divide, all of whose traffic is largely competitive with water carriers. When, through the operation of the present long- and short-haul clause, traffic is taken away from such rail carriers they have no great reservoir of traffic upon which they can draw.

Third, a tremendous amount of traffic formerly produced at inland points and marketed at points on or adjacent to navigable waters has been lost to such inland producers and the railways serving them by being diverted to other producers, even including those in foreign countries, using water routes, and which has been possible under the operation of the present long- and short-haul clause. The record shows that under the operation of the present long- and short-haul clause, thousands of industries in the interior of the country have literally dried up—they have lost the opportunity of successfully marketing their products at points on or adjacent to the seacoasts, because the railways have been denied the right to make rates necessary to meet the competition from other producing points, even those in foreign lands, using water carriers, unless such railways also reduce the rates to points where such strong competition does not exist and which in many cases is impossible because the loss would more than offset the gain.

Some question of the propriety of charging less for a longer haul than for an intermediate shorter haul has been raised. As I see it, the charging by a railway of a lower rate for a longer haul than for an intermediate haul, where such is made absolutely necessary if competition at the further distant point is to be met, is no different in principle from that followed by all other industries, including even the water lines who are handicapped by no such thing as a long- and short-haul clause. If the business cannot be obtained on basis of a normal reasonable rate and it becomes necessary to make a highly competitive rate which while low will yield more than out-of-pocket cost of its handling, the railway is justified in making such reduction and it ought not to be compelled to reduce the other rates as to which conditions are dissimilar.

If a producer of canned goods, steel, sugar, or any other commodity is to sell these products in any given market, he must meet the prices of his competitors or else retire from the field and market all of his products adjacent to his plant. At the further distant and highly competitive markets, in most instances he must accept a low measure of profit. If some commission made him accept the same low measure of profit—the lowest accepted on any goods—at all other places, he probably would have to retire from the competitive market. His local markets would have to support his plant if it continued to exist. This is precisely the situation in which the railways find themselves; but we properly allow industry in general to operate and make prices along sound business lines, but say to the railways—if you meet competition at a given place, and to do so have to establish a low rate which while low will more than pay the extra or out-of-pocket expenses of its transportation, you must also handle intermediate traffic not so highly competitive at the same low measure of profit—what is the result? The railway is simply forced out of the competitive traffic.

The situation was well described by James H. McCann, of Boston, Mass., representing the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, who said:

It has always been our view that the practice of the railroads to charge less for the longer than for the intermediate shorter haul, when forced to do so by competition, rests upon a well-known economic principle. This principle is illustrated in industry. If a manufacturer, when his plant is not fully engaged, can secure a contract which will cover his actual out-of-pocket expense, he can afford to take the contract at less than his regular price because whatever profit there is goes to reduce his general overhead.

Furthermore, if a manufacturer meets competition in one market but not in another, it is sound policy to lower the prices of his goods where such competition exists, provided the reduced prices cover out-of-pocket expenses and something more.

In the application of this principle to the railroads we believe they should be permitted to make rates low enough to meet competition. If these rates yield something more than the added cost of handling the traffic they thereby contribute to the aggregate earnings and make possible reductions in the rates to intermediate points. Conversely, if the carriers are prohibited from meeting this competition they must forego the additional amount above the handling costs which such traffic would contribute and must obtain their needed revenues from other traffic.

There is no difference in principle between (a) charging less for a longer than for an intermediate shorter haul and (b) charging different rates or charges for handling a given kind of freight between certain ports.

For example, on a shipment originating at port A and destined to port B a steamship line may charge $1 per 100 pounds, while for the same commodity handled by it between the same ports and in the same vessel it may charge 75 cents, 50 cents, or some other rate per 100 pounds if such shipment originates or terminates beyond port A or port B. There are present competitive and other conditions which make it simply impossible for such a steamship line to get exactly the same rate between port A and port B on a given kind of freight regardless of its origin or destination. It cannot blindly ignore the conditions with which it is faced, but must meet conditions as it finds them. If such a steamship line had, as to a given kind of freight, to accept on all of such freight the lowest rate or charge it makes on the most highly competitive freight of the same kind that it carries between such ports, it would soon go out of business.

Another illustration: A steamship line operating from New York to any port on the South Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific coast must, as to traffic originating at Harrisburg or Pittsburgh, Pa., accept a less rate or charge from New York than it can make if the same shipment originated at Albany or Syracuse, N. Y. The reason is that on a shipment originating at Harrisburg or Pittsburgh the New York steamship line comes into competition with one operating out of Baltimore, and the inland cost of getting the freight to New York is higher than it is to Baltimore. The New York line equalizes this competitive condition by accepting less for hauling the shipment from the more distant port of New York than from the less distant port of Baltimore. This is well recognized as a sound practice in the steamship as well as the railway business. While the New York line may not actually stop at Baltimore, the fact remains that the principle is the same—that is, a less rate is charged for a shorter than a longer haul, and which is absolutely necessary in order to meet competitive conditions beyond its control.

The situation with the railway is almost identical. The fact that a point is intermediate to a highly competitive place does not in itself require that the railway should in justice extend the highly competitive charge thereto. The loss in revenue might be more than the gain in revenue on the traffic to the point beyond. If because of the long- and short-haul clause the railway cannot afford to accept the same low rate to the intermediate point and it has to forego the handling of the traffic to the competitive point beyond and on which it could get some profit, however small, then the intermediate points are called upon to support the whole railway plant, while the small profit from the competitive traffic, such burden on the intermediate points would to that extent be lightened. Also, unlike the railways who have fixed tracks, the steamships and the motor trucks can run around a less distant point and avoid long- and short-haul difficulties and complications; but the principle of charging less for a longer than for a shorter haul is just the same.

I believe it is high time that we cease criticizing the railways for their alleged shortcomings and do something to enable them to freely transport the traffic for which they were constructed; enable them to better utilize their plants, give more employment, and buy more materials. Take off the long- and short-haul shackles and let them conduct their business along business lines. Let them be the judge in the first instance of what are profitable rates, and not a Government bureau in Washington not in direct contact with the business. As the committee in its report said:

The Commission, with the long- and short-haul provisions repealed as proposed, would have complete power under other provisions of the law to prevent railroads from doing anything which Congress ever intended they should be prevented from doing.

[Applause.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill. The author of the bill said in his opening statement that—

It is an unusual bill in the sense that it consists of only a page and a half, but a good deal of study and patience is necessary to understand its application.

It is true that this is an unusual bill, and it has complicated consequences, as I understand it from the debate upon the floor of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill, not because I have a great railroad population in my district, and I have a great many railroad people residing in my district who believe that this bill will accelerate railroad employment. They are fine people, they are good citizens, and for the most part they own their own homes. I have been asked to vote for the bill by some of the shippers in my State, but I am not going to vote for it because they have asked me to do so. Something has been said about the owners of railroad securities benefiting by the passage of this measure. This would not be a reason to vote for the bill. It has been said that some of the farm organizations are against the bill. To my mind that would not in itself be a justification for voting against the bill.

I am going to vote for the bill because I believe it to be in the national interest and in accordance with my philosophy of economics. Almost everyone has some philosophy of economics. I have my philosophy, which is that economic forces should, as far as possible and practical, remain free and unrestricted. I think it was the underlying purpose of the framers of the Constitution of the United States that so far as possible and practicable economic forces should be kept free. I am sorry to say that in the last few decades many things have happened to impede those economic forces. I refer particularly to police powers, trade restrictions, and also these rate restrictions. I think the same are a great impediment to free economics. Someone may say, "Well, you voted for a good deal of legislation here that restricted the freedom of economic action." It is true that I have voted for a good deal of that kind of legislation, but everyone on my side of the House has done so, and a good many on the other side of the House have done likewise. I did that contrary to my political philosophy and contrary to my idea of economics because I believed at the time that we were in an emergency which required the application of the things we did.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this bill squares with my economic philosophy. I believe it is to the interest of all the people of the United States; and I am not alone in that belief, as I have talked with a number of Members here, some of whom come from the West and the far West. They have stated to me that in their districts there is terrific opposition to the bill. I am glad to say, however, that every one of those men to whom I have talked, and there were a half dozen of them, have risen over this opposition which has a lot of political significance so far as the particular Members are concerned, and have told me they are going to vote in favor of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(1) That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act: Provided, That the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which common carriers may be relieved from the operation of this section: And provided further, That rates, fares, or charges existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act by virtue of orders of the Commission or as to which application has theretofore been filed with the Commission and not yet acted upon shall not be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section until the further order of or a determination by the Commission."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 9, after the word "Commission", insert a colon and the following: "And provided further, That in any case before the Commission where there is brought in issue a lower rate or charge for the transportation of like kind of property, for a longer than for a shorter distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to justify the rate or charge for the longer distance against any claim of a violation of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 16, insert a period after the word "distance" and strike out the remainder of the sentence.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, if the Committee followed the amendment, the language which I propose to strike out is the language appearing in line 16, on page 2, which reads, "against any claim of a violation of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act." In other words, by this amendment of the committee it is sought to continue in the carrier the burden of proof to justify the rate, fare, or charge, but this does not reach the vice or the iniquity in this situation.

Under existing law the carrier must justify the application before the Commission. Under the proposed law the carrier is not required to justify unless the community, the shipper, or some interested party assumes the burden of meeting that objection and raising the question before the Commission.

There is not a community in the United States, except possibly the larger cities of the United States, that has an expert able to interpret these tariffs and schedules.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] in his speech cited case after case where railroad presidents and railroad witnesses came before the committee, and whenever they were interrogated with respect to any rate, fare, or schedule, they would be compelled to turn the matter over to some rate expert who passed upon it. Is your community to be saddled with this burden?

The language proposed to be stricken out, "against any claim of a violation of sections 1, 2, and 3." What do sections 1, 2, and 3 deal with? Section 1 requires just and reasonable rates; section 2 forbids special rebates, special rates, and things of that kind; and section 3 undue prejudice. The community itself, under the committee amendment, has upon it the burden of coming before the Commission charging the violation and assuming the burden of the fight. I am taking away that burden. Let the carrier who has the information assume the burden of the fight. Let him protect the people of the community and not have them saddled with unjust and unreasonable rates or prejudicial charges that may be submitted by the carrier and of which the community will know nothing until somebody goes to the freight office and is met with the necessity of paying an increased charge upon the freight that he desires to ship.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him, since he has mentioned my name?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If this bill is passed, there will not be any such complex rate making as there is now under the fourth section.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, the gentleman has too great faith. Section 4 is not the only section that requires complex rate making. This is a delicate structure that has been built up throughout the years. The Commission was created in 1887 because of the unjust impositions of the railroads, and while I think there are just as honest and just as honorable men in the railroad business as in any other business, I just cite you to what General Ashburn said the railroads did with the Ensley Short Line down in Alabama.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, I ask your indulgence for a few minutes in order that I may deviate from the subject under discussion and bring before the Congress some pertinent facts regarding unemployment relief.

In his recent message to Congress the President asked for an appropriation of $1,500,000,000, and added that he wanted this money for the Works Progress Administration, stating that it was the responsibility of that agency to provide work for the destitute unemployed.

The works program was inaugurated with the purpose of giving employment to those on the relief rolls, and this restriction has made it impossible for those who are not actually reduced to receiving charitable aid to secure needed employment. Numerous complaints are being received regarding the limitation thus imposed on W. P. A. jobs, and judging from conversations I have had with other Members of Congress this dissatisfaction is widespread.

The fact that a man wants to be independent and pay his own way should not prevent him from securing work if he wants it. It should not be necessary for applicants to first accept a dole before they can qualify for a chance to earn a decent living. Concrete examples of this unfair discrimination are brought to my attention every day. A survey of the situation in various States would bear out the fact that there are more taxpayers in need of work relief than those actually receiving welfare aid. By the term "taxpayer" I refer to those citizens who have for years been supporting the city, county, State, and Federal Government through school, highway, municipal property, and other tax assessments.

Now that the Congress is preparing to consider the question of extending or continuing the Federal relief program, I think it opportune to compare the results obtained from the past expenditures for this purpose.

Since June 1933 I have been exceedingly interested in the public-works construction program. This program is not to be confused with the works-progress plan; they are as unrelated as night and day. At that time the country was economically ill, to say the least, and one of the important treatments prescribed was the construction of public works. An incentive was given to potential sponsors of projects in the form of grants from the Federal Government equaling 30 percent of the labor and materials.

However, there was no existing agency equipped to handle such a great undertaking, nor had any comprehensive plan of public works been formulated. No studies had been made during a period unruffled by economic distress, a time which would have been conducive to clear thinking and proper selection and distribution of projects. Consequently it became necessary to formulate an agency without previous experience to undertake this work. It was a tremendous undertaking, and Secretary Ickes should be congratulated on the result of his efforts in formulating the P. W. A., an organization noted for its integrity and professional ability.

There has been some criticism of the P. W. A. for its alleged slowness of action during the first program. This has been made, however, by those not realizing or those preferring not to acknowledge the lack of previous planning, the existence of usable statistics, and data upon which to proceed. Neither do they mention that now the P. W. A. is a going concern, having all the necessary personnel, organization, plans, and statistics necessary for proper, efficient, and speedy operation, and that this has been unequivocally proven in the E. R. A., P. W. A. program and the latter part of the N. I. R. A. program.

Under the E. R. A. program only $339,381,748 was allocated to the P. W. A., and $200,000,000 of this was withheld until September 1935. In spite of this late date, however, the P. W. A. had allotted $327,592,251 by December 31, 1935, for 4,158 different projects. Furthermore, on December 31 more than 80 percent of the actual construction contracts had been let, and bids had been received and contracts were about to be awarded to bring this total to 93 percent.

In connection with the value of public works as a stimulant to recovery, much data have been published to show the direct gainful employment furnished through the construction industry. This has been broken down into man-hours, total cost per man-year, Federal cost per man-year, and number of people put to work directly, but little has been said regarding those finding employment indirectly. It is true that indirect labor has been mentioned by those who have pondered the problem, but the references are mainly vague.

The ramifications of the construction industry are so numerous and important that they affect every corner of the country. The business and social activities of our country are mutually interdependent, and all must be functioning properly to create a balanced economic life. When a stimulant is applied to aid recovery, it must be injected into the blood stream of our interdependent existence. We cannot hope to effectively aid recovery unless this course is pursued.

Fortification of the construction industry does this very thing. For instance, the raw materials used in construction have widespread occurrences in nature and they must go through many stages of processing and transportation before actual use in construction works. Stone must be quarried, crushed, separated into sizes, and mixed with other materials in proper amounts. Limestone and gypsum must be quarried and converted into cement and plaster. Iron ore must be mined, shipped, smelted, and converted into structural and reinforcing steel. Cotton must be grown, ginned, shipped, and woven into fabric for tires, belts, and containers. It is definitely a progression affecting every important factor of our economic structure.

The mechanics followed in the production of construction projects are not unlike those of a tree in producing fruit. For instance, the numerous tree roots take elements from the ground and convert them into essentials necessary for life and production. Similarly the producer-goods industries secure raw materials from nature and refine and convert them into usable products. The tree conducts the essentials produced by the roots through the alburnum of the trunk to the branches. Likewise, the transportation industries convey the products of the producer-goods industries to the various branches of the construction industry.

The leaves of the tree create a further chemical change essential to life, and the blossoms produce fruit. In the construction industry the many types of projects are distributed to the appropriate branches of industry where proper engineers and contractors plan, assemble, and construct the ultimate project.

The importance of the construction industry is clearly shown by table I, which I shall later ask to have inserted in the Record, which indicates an average annual expenditure of $8,894,875,000 during the years from 1926 to 1933 for direct construction.

In 1928, $12,000,000,000 was expended for construction. This reduced to approximately $11,000,000,000 in 1929 and then collapsed to a little over $3,000,000,000 in 1933. This abnormal fluctuation, with its accompanying disturbances in other industries, was a major factor contributing to the depression.

According to figures published by the Bureau of Public Roads, approximately 122,000,000 people (1925-33) are normally supported by 47,000,000 gainful workers, 13,000,000 of whom are directly in the construction industry and related producer-goods industries. The remaining 34,000,000 are in the consumer field producing and distributing goods consumed by the entire 122,000,000.

Since unemployment decreases consumption and increases dependency, when 7,000,000 lost employment through collapse of the construction industry it caused a further unemployment, it has been conservatively estimated, of 4,000,000 people in the consumer field. Statistics on this will be shown in a table to be inserted in the RECORD.

In order to show the effect of construction upon indirect labor, several manufacturing organizations, Federal bureaus, and construction organizations have conducted extensive research and prepared comprehensive reports of their studies. The published reports necessarily deal with statistics which are a few years old, for a thorough study requires many months to complete. Furthermore, the compilation of the basic statistics lag behind the end of the calendar year. However, for the purpose of this study they are adequate, since it is proof of the employment distribution that is paramount, not mere figures.

On September 21, 1933, the Construction League of the United States, a federation of practically every association interested in construction work, published a report in the Engineering News-Record entitled "Employment Values in Construction." This analysis points out that in 1929 the production of construction materials employed every tenth manufacturing worker and that this fabrication proceeded in a quarter of the country's factories and mills. It also states that one of every five carloads of freight moved carried construction materials, and that 8 percent of all wholesalers were engaged in the distribution of construction goods.

This presents an interesting picture, for it shows many States not normally considered as such to be heavy producers of construction materials, as, for instance, Mississippi, Louisiana, Oregon, and Washington. It indicates these States as being greater producers than Massachusetts and Missouri, their importance being attributed to lumber production, which predominates in the South and Northwest.

Probably one of the most valuable analyses of public works expenditures that has as yet been published is given in An Economic and Statistical Analysis of Highway Construction Expenditures, a report published June 1935 by the Bureau of Public Roads. This treats of a $100,000,000 highway expenditure to determine the amount of direct, indirect, and total employment furnished, the various industries affected, and the total value of business erected. The analysis is comparable to all public works, for highway construction includes every basic industry affected by general public works. It is true there will be some variation by reason of the greater refinement in processing materials for public works and in their greater value. Also there will be some variation because of their difference in locations, highway funds being expended largely in rural areas and public work principally in urban areas. This affects the amounts paid to labor directly on projects. However, when both direct and indirect labor are considered, total accruals will be substantially the same as those developed in highway construction. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that the total employment furnished per dollar expended is practically the same, and the determinations in the report become of tremendous value in aiding one to appreciate the full effects of public works.

Some astounding facts are brought to light which should be known generally. It proves the need of public works as a stabilizing influence in times of economic distress.

For instance, from a direct highway expenditure of $100,000,000, neglecting reinvestment, $74,726,000 goes for direct and indirect labor and results in $231,000,000 of business value. I have prepared a table—no. III—which will appear in the RECORD itemizing these expenditures and showing the amount apportioned to 21 basic industries affected. The difference between salaries and wages and the $100,000,000—namely, $25,274,000—is divided into interest and margin and is available for reinvestment in the producer- and consumer-goods fields. When this sum is also broken down it shows that the entire $100,000,000 expenditure ultimately finds its way to wages and salaries in the following proportion:

1. Direct construction.....	$24,391,000
2. Investment in producer goods.....	50,335,000
3. Reinvestment in producer goods.....	14,827,600
4. Reinvestment in consumer goods.....	10,446,400

Table IV gives an analysis of the ultimate distribution to salaries and wages of the $100,000,000 expenditure.

In the final break-down including reinvestment the report shows that 102,690 persons would be employed for a year at an average rate of $970.

I have secured a table, no. V, giving a complete analysis.

During periods of economic stress reinvestment in producer goods will not readily take place. In other words, funds which would normally find their way back to industry through capital investments will become temporarily stagnated, and consequently the results of this type of reinvestment have been discarded in analyzing the effects of public works. It should be considered, though, when studying the effects of a long-range program.

Reinvestment in consumer goods, however, is considered, for this represents expenditures for cost of living alone, such as food, clothing, housing, amusements, and contingencies.

When the deduction for producer-goods reinvestment is made, the salaries and wages total $85,172,400 and represent a year's gainful employment for approximately 90,000 persons. This is approximately equal to 1.4 men working indirectly for each person employed on direct construction projects. Table VI gives the procedure followed in making this computation.

I cite these incontrovertible studies to prove that indirect labor benefiting from public works is an important factor and that, according to highway report, approximately seven men are employed indirectly for every five men employed on the construction site.

Table VII shows the estimated cost, P. W. A. allotments, and funds supplied by applicants as distributed by States on December 31, 1935. Table VIII indicates the same allotments distributed by type of project.

As stated previously, the total P. W. A. construction program as of December 31, 1935, under the E. R. A., consisted of 4,158 projects, the total cost of which is estimated as $748,547,711. Of this amount the Government has granted $327,592,251 to aid sponsors of projects in financing the construction.

According to completed and finally audited P. W. A. projects, 32.6 percent of the total cost goes for direct labor.

By applying this percentage to the $748,548,000 P. W. A. program, it indicates that $244,026,648 will go to direct labor. The remaining amount, or $504,521,352, when divided into indirect labor by using reinvestment percentages computed from table IV, shows that $393,512,352 will go to indirect labor. This is exclusive of producer-goods reinvestment and represents only the first cycle of distribution. Table IX gives a more complete analysis of the break-down.

This means that out of the $748,548,000 P. W. A. program, 85.2 percent of the expenditure will go to direct and indirect labor and that approximately 208,570 man-years of direct labor and 339,527 man-years of indirect labor will result. This illustrates that approximately 1.62 men will receive employment indirectly for each one employed directly and that approximately 548,097 men will receive work for a 1-year period.

This being the case, the cost to the Federal Government per man-year is equal to $327,592,251, divided by 548,097, or approximately $598.

At the present time the Public Works Administration has many additional projects on file which have been submitted in good faith by political subdivisions scattered throughout the United States. It was represented to them that the Government would aid in financing these, and they incurred considerable expense in the preparation of plans, legal data, purchase of lands, and in submitting applications, only to discover that funds were not available.

The projects include a wide diversification of type. There are schools, hospitals, jails, many types of buildings; streets, highways, bridges, sewerage systems, treatment plants, water systems, dams, wharves, and many others. Furthermore, they are scattered throughout the country, and every State has many worth-while projects pending.

The Public Works Administration has analyzed these and divided them into two types. The first list represents those which are apparently ready to proceed with immediate construction and which can be carried direct to a successful completion. This group is known as list B and B-1, shown in table X, and sets forth the amounts by States, and comprises 6,130 different projects, the total cost of which is estimated as $2,239,732,000. Of this amount $817,459,000 is requested in the form of outright grants.

The amount shown as the estimated cost of the pending B and B-1 P. W. A. projects and the total amount of grants requested by their sponsors are not likely to be required in their entirety. Undoubtedly, some applications were filed by overzealous officials who, since filing the applications, find that they will be unable to proceed. This has happened in the past. Furthermore, legal and other extenuating circumstances will arise occasionally to prevent the sponsor's acceptance of a P. W. A. allocation. I believe, after a study of past experiences, that approximately 15 percent of the projects which are now pending will be unable to be constructed, and that $700,000,000 will be a sufficient sum to successfully complete the pending P. W. A. program.

The projects which would be constructed by a $700,000,000 P. W. A. program would be of a permanent nature and increase the wealth of the Nation by the total amount expended for them. Furthermore, the work would exert a tremendous stimulating effect on all industry, and as a result materially relieve the unemployment situation. Consequently I have introduced a resolution—House Joint Resolution 492—which would definitely allocate $700,000,000 to the Federal Administration of Public Works in order that the pending approved program may be completed, the intimated agreement with the sponsor fulfilled, and the benefits to industry and labor secured.

During the past year business employment and private enterprises have shown encouraging signs of revival. We are now recovering from an economic intoxication and despondency resulting from our former happy-go-lucky system of indulgence. Thanks to the country's vitality and the inherent will of the American people to survive the crises and respond to treatment. Let us not discard the tonic of effective public works at this time.

The prescription is not new. It was used over 6,000 years ago by ancient rulers, who placed thousands upon thousands of men on construction work during depression times to keep them in peaceful occupation, rather than to become inflamed with thoughts of war and vandalism through morale breaking and inactivity. Furthermore, this admirable undertaking was in many instances definitely accomplished, and, at the same time, amazing engineering problems were mastered. Many of the works have lasted until the present time, and are even now of great economic value to the countries through the tourists they attract and the resultant benefits derived through this traffic to the consumer-goods industries.

This country has successfully followed the same principle and has materially stimulated recovery through public works. I believe and think that all my colleagues will also concur that the public-works program was a major contributing factor in setting the wheels of economic recovery in motion. I am sure that economists, business interests, and employees alike will agree that construction work of a permanent nature, work which will result in structures enabling citizens of their communities to live a more pleasant, safe, and useful life are worth while and of tremendous value in stimulating direct and indirect reemployment.

The appropriation of $700,000,000, which I have proposed, to contribute 45 percent of a public-works program, will result in a series of projects which total $1,555,600,000; 85.2 percent of the total cost; namely, $1,325,000,000, will be provided for direct and indirect labor. This sum will furnish a year's employment at current wages and salaries to 1,140,000 persons at a per capita cost to the United States Government of only $615.

I am a firm believer in the P. W. A. plan. It is effective immediately, and when the depression is over all of the public dollars expended in the program will be paying dividends in socially valuable, Nation-enriching works. I solicit your support in continuing this program for the benefit of all. I ask your cooperation in securing the necessary funds in relieving unemployment in the heavy industries by direct appropriation or by earmarking a portion of the relief fund to be appropriated in the near future. You will be interested to know that voters have assessed themselves, as local taxpayers, in 2,166 out of 2,613 elections for local contributions of the greater part of the funds required to secure the benefits P. W. A. offers. These local bond elections, in which 10,000,000 votes were cast, show the willingness of communities in your congressional districts and mine to contribute their own funds for P. W. A. projects. [Applause.]

The following tables illustrate various phases which I discussed in my speech:

(Mr. BETTER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to revise and extend his remarks, and include therein certain tables.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the enacting clause, strike out all that follows and in lieu thereof insert the following: "That paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this part to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this part; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this part to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the Commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the Commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section."

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, the substitute which I have offered in this case is known as the Rayburn amendment to section 4.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. There has been so much talk about the Holmes amendment being the Rayburn bill that I think I ought to make a statement of a few moments in reference to it, if the gentleman will yield. As chairman of the committee, I introduce suggestions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They send up their recommendations and bills, and many of them I introduced without ever seeing them. This one I did see, but, as far as its being a Rayburn bill, that is a misnomer. It is a suggestion of the Interstate Commerce Commission of a year ago. I might say to the gentleman that the Interstate Commerce Commission at this time has another suggestion, and they would not, as I understand it, recommend this bill the gentleman offers as an amendment at this time as their sole suggestion with reference to the rearrangement of paragraph 1 of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Just to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Do I understand from the chairman, in view of the statement he just made, that while the so-called Holmes amendment does not reflect the views of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they have changed from the time of the introduction of the so-called Rayburn bill, the Commission does have definite ideas of how section 4 should be amended, and it is not in favor of the so-called Pettengill bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I did not in any way want to infer to the House that I was introducing this measure at the instigation of the chairman. I am doing it believing myself, after many weeks attending the hearings of the subcommittee, that that is about as far as we should go in amending section 4. On the floor a short time ago I told the reason I believed we should not wipe out section 4 in its entirety, but eliminating the controversial provisions in section 4 as they are at the present time, namely, reasonably compensatory, equidistant, and potential water competition, I believe it will give the necessary flexibility to the act so that the Interstate Commerce Commission can extend greater relief to the railroads under section 4. I believe we can go too far in this sort of legislation, and I assure the members of the committee that it does not affect my district. But there has been built around section 4 a tremendous volume of decisions by various courts and the Supreme Court which are more or less the basis of regulating and building up the railroad industry of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I further believe—and I think it was so stated during the hearings on the Pettengill bill—that it is more or less the general opinion on the part of the railroad managements that under the present section 4, provided the Interstate Commerce Commission wants to extend relief, there is flexibility enough as it stands today to render such relief. But to make it sure and make it more flexible, if you take out of the present act paragraphs A, B, and C, there is no question at all but that there is ample flexibility for the Interstate Commerce Commission to extend this relief. In the present bill the railroads must file their rates with the Commission. That affords the shipping interests of the country and the various States that are interested in rates an opportunity to find out what those rates are, and it is up to the railroads to produce the evidence which warrants the relief they may ask. Under the Pettengill bill the railroads can put their rates into effect and merely file them with the Commission, thus putting them in force and placing the burden on the little shipper in the United States to file the complaint with the Commission. I say that it is wrong to place this burden on the shipping interests of the United States. I am just as keen for relief of the railroads as anyone. I realize their importance to the industries of the United States, and I am willing to go as far as anybody to assist them, but I do not believe we should go so far that eventually we will do more harm than good. I believe that will be the ultimate result of passing the Pettengill bill in its present form.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the railroads do not have to file their proposed new rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. HOLMES. Oh, no; I did not say that. They have to file the rates.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And then there are 30 days in which either the Commission or the shipper can file objection, and if objection is made there must be a hearing held, and that hearing, with the burden on the railroads, must be determined within 6 months.

Mr. HOLMES. But it places the responsibility on the shipper to file a complaint.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. He simply files objection to the rate and that suspends the rate.

Mr. HOLMES. How is it possible for any little shipper in some remote part of the United States entirely away from all centers of activity to find out what rates any railroad company may file with the Commission?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to answer that by saying the shipping interests are organized and all have representatives here in Washington.

Mr. HOLMES. I appreciate that is correct to some extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES]. I rise particularly for the purpose of making perfectly clear, if I can, the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman's amendment simply restores section 4, insofar as the long- and short-haul clause is concerned, to exactly what it was in 1910. The present long- and short-haul clause was enacted in 1910. In fact, it was enacted in 1887, but as it was originally enacted, it carried the phrase "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." Those words were stricken out of the long- and short-haul clause in 1910. Otherwise it reads today just exactly as it read in 1887 when it was first enacted. The effect of the gentleman's amendment will be to simply preserve the long- and short-haul clause in effect just as it has been since 1910; and, therefore, utterly nullifies the entire objective of the Pettengill bill.

Mr. PETTENGILL. It is since 1910 that all of this competition has arisen.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. All this competition has arisen since 1910, and I may say since 1920. Now, bear in mind the long- and short-haul clause now and in 1920, reads exactly as it did in 1910 when it was enacted in its present form, but Congress tightened it up in 1920 by the introduction of three additional restrictions. The first of those was what was called the reasonably compensatory clause. What that is has not yet been determined after 15 years. Coordinator Eastman says it is still a matter of controversy what "reasonably compensatory" means. It seems to me if the Interstate Commerce Commission cannot determine what that clause is after 15 years it ought to go out.

The second restriction was what was called the equidistant rule. I shall not try to explain that to you. The only man who can explain the equidistant clause is Professor Einstein, and he is not here. It is admitted by all concerned that it ought to go into the wastebasket. Nobody can apply it satisfactorily, so, by common consent, it can go out.

The third restriction imposed in 1920 was denial of fourth-section relief to the railroads against potential water competition. That is, if water competition was going to be put in some place, the railroads could not get fourth-section relief just on account of that potential competition. The way it works out in actual practice is this: Before the water competition goes in, it is too early to apply for relief, and after it goes in it is too late. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to say that my colleague has stated the reasons why I want to eliminate those three features far better than I could have explained it. I appreciate his support. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Those three restrictions are minor. They are not material. It would not afford any practical relief whatever, except the red tape it causes, to strike them from the bill. The heart of this relief is in the long- and short-haul clause, which has built up, as the gentleman says, not only a great many volumes of precedents but a great many volumes of red tape, which has crystallized the fourth section until it has occasioned such delay and expense to both carriers and shippers that it is not surprising that organizations of shippers are here from all over the country, from Boston, Philadelphia, Jacksonville, San Francisco, and other water ports, as well as from inland country, asking the Congress to free the railroads at this time from this choking restriction. It is outgrown and obsolete. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. In listening to these amendments being read, I am impressed with the fact that they are not being offered for the purpose of improving the bill. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce held hearings on this measure for over 2 weeks, during the entire day and sometimes far into the night. This legislation has been very carefully considered and I think it is of too great importance to take snap judgment on amendments that are offered on the floor at this time. I want to assure the Members of the House that this measure is of the greatest importance to our section of the country, and I am speaking of the interior United States. Let us vote down all amendments that are not approved by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman that I have just been advised by one of our colleagues that some of the Members think an objection filed against a proposed rate under this bill does not have the effect of suspending the rate, but that the rate will go into effect; whereas the fact is, an objection suspends the rate until there have been hearings in the usual way before the Commission.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And a decision rendered within 7 months instead of 2 or 5 or 6 years.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if it is not true, notwithstanding that fact, that under the present law, if a railroad desires to establish a new rate, it is required to file its application for that rate, the entire burden being on the carrier; but under the proposed amendment, if this bill should become a law, it would mean that the railroad could set up that rate and unless an individual shipper down in the interior agricultural section of the country went to the expense of employing counsel and filing formal protest against that rate, the rate would go into effect?

The burden of protesting, therefore, actually falls on the shipper and not on the carrier.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would rather not answer the gentleman; I would rather have the author of the bill answer him if he wants to.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The burden is on the shipper.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The burden is on the railroads under the amendment; it so reads plainly.

FOURTH-SECTION AMENDMENT (H. R. 3263)

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to amend section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act in that it removes from this section what is known as the long- and short-haul clause. That clause, which appears in paragraph (1) of section 4, declares that it is unlawful to charge a higher rate for carrying persons or property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance.

The foundation of regulation for transportation is rates.

Section 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act states that rates charged by rail carriers must be just and reasonable, and all unjust and unreasonable rates are unlawful.

Section 2 declares that any "special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device" to any person or persons not charged to all others for the same service is unlawful.

Section 3 renders unlawful the giving of any undue or unreasonable preference or charge to any person or company or locality or traffic and prohibits the subjecting of any person or company or locality or traffic to undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever. This is a most comprehensive provision and covers every phase of the subject.

The Interstate Commerce Act was passed by Congress when railroads were considered to be and were, in fact, the dominant transportation agency in the country. Congress placed upon them the burden of proof to justify every rate and every rate change to which any shipper might object. In 1920 Congress went further and gave the Commission power and authority to determine both maximum and minimum rates to be charged for services rendered. Thus, while railroads may initiate rates and changes in rates, the Commission will determine the rate itself upon complaint by any shipper.

Section 4, containing the long- and short-haul principle, grew out of a controversy between waterway interests and rail interests at the time of the original act back in 1887. At that time railroads had taken most of the traffic from the waterways. The Commission was given authority only to declare maximum rates unjust and unreasonable. There were few waterway improvements and very little water-borne traffic. There was no Panama Canal, no Government barge line, no lavish and wasteful expenditures on rivers, as on the upper Mississippi today. There was no motor vehicle or system of improved roads.

Congress changed this fourth section from time to time, in 1910 and 1920, tightening up the restrictions on the rail carriers. It has become a strait jacket on the railroads in their competition with waterway and highway carriers. A representative of the water lines, in the hearing before the House committee, admitted that under the fourth section water carriers had a monopoly on intercoastal traffic.

The result of this water-line monopoly on intercoastal traffic has been to cut off the great Middle West, dependent upon rail transportation, from the Pacific coast markets. Industries have moved to the Atlantic coast in order to be able to take advantage of this unhandicapped water transportation. The traffic director of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, commenting on the long- and short-haul clause and its effects, has said:

And what has happened in our territory here in the Mississippi Valley? Here at Minneapolis and at St. Paul industries that formerly shipped to Pacific coast territory in train loads have been denied access to that territory because the carriers could not meet the competition of the water rates from the Atlantic to the Pacific without reducing all the rates to the intermediate territory. * * * Today it is necessary to haul thousands of empty cars westward over the mountains to handle the business that moves east-bound from the Pacific coast.

Give the railroads a chance to handle this west-bound traffic, give the Mississippi Valley cities a chance to reengage in manufacturing and distribution in their natural trade territory on the Pacific coast in competition with the Atlantic coast, and we will all profit by it.

Now, what is the proposal in this amendment? Is the public interest fully protected? The proposal is to leave untouched sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act. It proposes that all rates, including those which involve length of haul, shall be brought to the test of reasonableness set up in those first three sections and these rates which involve length of haul shall be regulated in precisely the same way as every other rate.

It is to be noted that paragraph (2) of this fourth section remains unchanged. It says that whenever a rate has been lowered at a competitive point on account of water competition, such rate shall not again be raised except for some reason other than the elimination of such water competition.

I believe that the public interest is fully protected with the elimination of this long- and short-haul clause. Rates will still be determined in the public interest; competition will be more nearly equal. Rates under section 4 are rates to competitive points, and a competitive point is one where alternative routes are open. There are, therefore, always two simple principles to keep in mind:

(a) The Commission determines minimum rates, so that railroads cannot put in cutthroat rates to destroy a competitor.

(b) There is always an alternative agency for the shipper to use, an alternative agency that is not merely potential in character but is active, alive, competitive.

This amendment will make competition more nearly equal and fair. We must recognize that within the past 15 years new, great transport agencies have developed by water and by highway. We have left them free to compete for traffic while we have kept the railroads shackled as if they had not developed. While protecting the public interest in every way, we ought to make the conditions of competition fair.

This amendment only proposes to let rail carriers have a fair opportunity to compete for traffic. The railroads are an agency in which volume of traffic is of great importance, for the reason that their fixed costs are large. Their roadway is there and must be maintained; their equipment is there and must be maintained; the employees who operate them are there and must be paid wages. Unless there is volume of traffic, there are either losses or higher rates will have to be charged on what traffic remains.

This amendment will permit the railroads to use their equipment to better advantage. They can use their roadway to a greater extent. They can employ more men to repair track and equipment and to operate trains. They can make greater purchases of materials and supplies. The people in the inland empire have been mistaken. They have thought that they would get an advantage by a strict fourth-section clause. They have not profited. Spokane has not grown as have Seattle and Portland and San Francisco and Los Angeles. But the people in the inland empire have found out that trains that formerly went through there carrying freight to the Pacific coast have been abandoned. Railroad employees located in that region have been thrown out of jobs. But if the railroads are able to recover some of the traffic which they formerly had, more trains will be operated, more people will be employed. The Middle West and the inland empire will both profit.

Under this amendment every rate must still be just and reasonable. It will be tested by all the principles developed under sections 1, 2, and 3. This amendment proposes only to let the railroads, if they can gain the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, lower rates to competitive points so as to increase their volume of traffic, and secure some additional revenue to meet overhead costs.

Who are supporting this amendment? The railroads, all of them, are urging it upon our attention. Their employees, a million strong, are supporting it. The National Industrial Traffic League, representing hundreds of thousands of shippers throughout the country is supporting it. The sugar-beet industry of the Middle West and the West indorse it. The growers of perishable products, many manufacturing industries and the mining industry support it.

Who are opposing it? The opponents are the coastwise and intercoastal water carriers and the inland waterway lines. There are certain commercial organizations that have allied themselves with these water carriers, and there is the seamen's union.

I have undertaken to examine the arguments for and against as presented by these two groups, and I shall undertake briefly to discuss them.

(a) Advocates of this amendment say that, with the fourth section as it now is, competition is unfair to railroads; the opponents say that to give the railroads relief will result in the destruction of the waterways.

Now, I have shown that under sections 1, 2, and 3 all rates must still be just and reasonable. Section 3 is even more comprehensive than is section 4 with respect to just and reasonable rates. The Commission has the power to determine minimum rates, and the burden of proof to show that rates are just and reasonable rests upon the railroads. Therefore the Commission cannot allow under these sections a railroad to put in cutthroat rates for destructive purposes.

Now, in making rates there is a zone of reasonableness. The upper limit of that zone is fixed at a point where the rate becomes so high traffic will not move. The lower limit is fixed by the out-of-pocket cost in handling traffic. Between these two limits a just and reasonable rate is a matter of informed judgment in the light of existing conditions. It is the zone of competition. As a rate approaches the lower limit it becomes a depressed or a competitive rate. If all traffic were carried at a deeply depressed rate, a railroad would get into financial difficulty, for it could not fully meet all of its overhead costs. On the other hand, until the rate does reach that lower limit of out-of-pocket costs traffic will pay something toward overhead costs. The railroad can afford to take it rather than to lose it altogether. But to get such traffic it cannot afford to reduce correspondingly all of its rates to intermediate points. This would bring the whole class of rates into the depressed-rate zone.

Here is the whole essence of this fourth-section argument. This amendment proposes to let the railroads, if they can gain the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, lower rates to competitive points into the depressed-rate area in order to share the traffic, increase their volume, and secure additional revenue to meet overhead costs.

(b) The proponents say that a fair opportunity to share in traffic to competitive points will increase their volume of traffic, employ their facilities and their men to a fuller extent, enable them to buy more materials and supplies, keep up their maintenance, and pay their taxes; the opponents claim that any restoration of traffic from waterways to rail carriers will impair investment in harbor facilities and increase the taxpayers' burden.

If there is to be impairment of investment, and there need not be, an impaired railroad investment would be far more disastrous to the people of the country than any other. There are $6,600,000,000 of railroad bonds in the hands of savings banks, insurance companies, and other institutions. The total investment in railroad property throughout the country is over twenty-six billions. There is an investment of five and one-half billions in seven large transcontinental railroads, as compared with $85,000,000 in intercoastal ship lines. The railroads are paying about 8 percent of their gross revenue in taxes, which are distributed throughout the entire country and support our schools and local governments. These intercoastal carriers, as their record shows, are paying five one-hundredths of 1 percent of their gross revenue in taxes. That is 50 cents per $1,000 of revenues for these water lines, as compared to $80 for each $1,000 of revenue for railroads. That is the picture there.

But it is not all. More than 68,000 miles of road, or about 20 percent of the total railroad mileage, is in bankruptcy today. Except for one railroad in New England and one in the Southeastern States, this bankrupt mileage will be found in the Middle West and two allied systems between Colorado and the coast. The Middle West is the greatest and richest agricultural region in the world. Yet in South Dakota 81 percent of the entire railroad mileage is in bankruptcy; 77 percent in Iowa; 79 percent in Arkansas; 68 percent in Wisconsin; 65 percent in southern Minnesota; 44 percent in Colorado; 48 percent in Oklahoma; and 43 percent in Kansas. This great region has had its difficulties. Two and three years ago it was visited with the greatest drought in history. But certainly one cause of this railroad situation is to be found in the diversion of traffic from these rail carriers to the Panama Canal under the long- and short-haul clause as it now stands. Under this clause the Interstate Commerce Commission has refused relief in every important case since 1920. The Pacific coast markets have been lost to the Middle West.

(c) The proponents claim fourth-section relief will not injure but will benefit intermediate territory; the opponents claim the intermediate territory will be injured.

I have shown how important volume of traffic is to the railroads to meet heavy overhead costs. I have shown how increased volume of traffic makes work all along the way.

There are more trains, more work in shops, more buying of supplies, more money for overhead costs, including taxes, more employment, and more buying power among the people. The more distant points are not given any relative advantage. There is no prejudice or preference as to localities, for the reason that competitive points have alternative service there already. Otherwise, there is no fourth-section case.

(d) The proponents claim that noncompetitive points will not be injured but helped; the opponents claim the rates will be made so low at competitive points as to place an additional burden on traffic to noncompetitive points.

All rates will have to be just and reasonable. All rates will have to be made to pay out-of-pocket costs and contribute something to overhead costs. For anyone to doubt that the Commission would hold rates within a level which would make some contribution to overhead costs is to cast doubt on all rate regulation. Any additional traffic on the railroads that will contribute to overhead costs will, at the same time, lighten that burden to that extent. There will be so much less for other traffic to pay. Therefore, the greater the volume of traffic carried by the railroads, the less proportion of overhead costs noncompetitive points will be burdened with.

(e) Opponents of this amendment have argued that traffic must be preserved for water lines in order to build up a merchant marine.

This is the particular argument of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York. To support this amendment is not to be against a strong merchant marine. In time of war every kind of transport will be used to the extent of its usefulness. Military experts declare that railroads will be indispensable. The point really is, however, that one transportation agency should not be required to assume the burden of providing the facilities of another agency which will be useful in case of war. To provide for national defense is a national responsibility. A strong merchant marine should not be paid for by taking it out of the hides of railroad investors and railroad employees.

We must approach this question from the point of view of general public interest. There are five great agencies of transportation in this country—by rail, by water, by highway, by pipe line, by air. All of them are useful. Congress has stated a national policy in section 500 of the Transportation Act, 1920, to promote and sustain in full vigor both rail and water transportation. In section 202 of the Motor Carrier Act, 1935, Congress stated a policy to "develop and preserve a highway transportation system." We have permitted pipe lines to develop with very little regulation at all. We are aiding airways with substantial payments out of the Federal Treasury every year. To no one of these transport agencies, except railroads, has Congress applied a long- and short-haul clause. If we are to support them all, and if they are to be in competition, they should be able to meet on fair and equal terms.

The railroads today are carrying the majority of traffic. There is no reason in relative usefulness to hamstring them. They must be treated with fairness. Under the changed conditions which the railroads face today, fairness demands relief from this outmoded long- and short-haul clause.

The proposed amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as to this bill, it appears that the proponents of this bill are about to win a very great victory in behalf of the owners of the railroads and against the principle of control of public utilities. As has been many times observed during this debate by gentlemen understanding the effect of the proposal, it is the farmers of the country who are going to lose most as the result of the change. The propagandists have been very smart.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Not now.

The propagandists have been very smart in drawing into the fight the railway laborer. The laborer is made to believe that there is promise of more jobs for the unemployed in the legislation. I doubt this. The railroads will confess behind the backs of labor that they can handle greatly increased tonnage without the necessity of an increase in labor costs; so, as I see it, labor is very much deceived, because there is not in the legislation the prospect of much help. But if I am wrong about this, if, as a matter of fact, the adoption of the bill does mean more jobs, then certainly I am not in error in the statement that the carrier should not be permitted to fix rates without first obtaining leave from the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bill, as drawn, involves a complete reversal of policy insofar as the development of the waterways and the control of public utilities engaged in interstate commerce are concerned.

The pending amendment should, in my opinion, be adopted. There is just as much in it for labor as there would be in the Pettengill bill. The only difference between the Pettengill bill and the pending amendment is that under the amendment the carrier would have to go to the Commission for permission to change its rates, whereas the Pettengill bill proposes to permit them to file their schedules, and in the event of complaint it would be within the power of the Commission to suspend them.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to appreciate the logic of the proposal that an instrumentality supposed to be under the jurisdiction of a regulatory body should be permitted without permission whatever or without any grant of authority, but under its right under the law to file its rate schedule which should be subject to suspension upon the filing of a complaint.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman realize that for 49 years, since 1887, in the case of every rate proposed by a railroad in the United States, except where the question of long and short haul is involved, the procedure the gentleman is objecting to is the one that has been followed; and this places the procedure on the same basis?

Mr. COX. The gentleman has stated before committees that under his bill the carriers will be permitted to put their rates into effect, either raising or lowering rates, which will become effective unless some interested party makes complaint or unless the Commission of its own accord should order suspension. This is his bill.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman is correct. That is the way it is done in all other instances.

Mr. COX. Why should the policy that has prevailed heretofore be reversed and the burden put upon the shipper and the small community to challenge the fairness of the rates made by a railroad? Why should not the rule be continued requiring railroads first to obtain permission to change rates? The roads are particularly interested in this, although they have sought to conceal this interest by putting stress upon the long and short haul and this purpose. The membership of the House has been made to believe that the primary concern of the carriers was to eliminate the long- and short-haul provision of section 4 of the Transportation Act, but this is not the extent of their interest. They want a free hand to fix rates as their interest may dictate.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I paid very strict attention to what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] stated a few moments ago, that railroad labor was being fooled on this bill. I believe that the railroad employees of this country are smart enough and they are intelligent enough to know what is good for them, what is beneficial for them. They have some very able and capable representatives in Washington looking after their interests all the time. They have some very smart attorneys looking after their interests. I do not believe the gentleman from Georgia, who has never had any railroad experience in his life, can fool the railroad employees when it comes to legislation relating to the great transportation systems of the country, and they are back of this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMACK. What effect will this bill have upon the employees of trucks, the employees of shipping lines, the longshoremen?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I reply by saying that the railroad employees well know the new competition, the truck and the bus, is here to stay. They know that transportation by water has its place in our economic life, and they have no desire at all in any way to injure this traffic. All they are asking is that they be given an opportunity under the same regulations and under the same conditions enjoyed by steamship lines, busses, and trucks today. That is all they are asking.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has not answered the question. I asked him what effect it will have.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not know what effect it will have.

Mr. McCORMACK. In any event, this bill will not harm the present status of railroad employees?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No; not at all.

Mr. McCORMACK. But it will harm the status of other employees?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not believe so.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Is there not just as much for labor in the pending amendment as there is in the Pettengill bill?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No.

Mr. COX. What possible reason would labor have for relieving the roads of obtaining leave before any change of rates?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If there was just as much benefits in the pending amendment as in the Pettengill bill, the labor organizations would have been back of that bill when it was introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] 1 year ago.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this may be a good bill for some sections of the country. It may be a good bill for the railroads. But as the Representative of a district which I think may be typical of many represented in this House, one of the interior agricultural districts where there is no competing water transportation, I desire briefly to express my opinion on that phase of the subject. I have the honor to represent a large and one of the richest agricultural districts in this country. Its cities and towns have no competing waterway transportation, and I am contemplating the effect that the enactment of a bill of this kind would have upon the agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests of a district like that. I know from the experience of farmers, millers, wholesalers, livestock producers, and shippers generally of that district that this long- and short-haul provision has been their salvation many times in the past and is their safeguard today against unreasonable and discriminatory freight rates.

Under the existing law a carrier cannot put in effect a higher freight rate for a shorter than for a longer distance until it justifies that rate as reasonable in the eyes of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The burden rests actually as well as nominally on the carriers. The so-called Pettengill bill would, notwithstanding all that has been said about "burden of proof", actually shift the burden to the shipper. If this bill becomes a law a carrier can publish a freight rate on any commodity providing a higher rate over shorter distances to intermediate points than over longer distances to terminal points, and the practical effect will be that the shipper will have to file a protest to prevent the rate from becoming effective. They say that the burden of proof will be on the carrier, but the truth is that the real burden, the burden of employing counsel, the burden of prosecuting the complaint, the burden of expense of proving that the new rate is discriminatory or unreasonable will rest upon the intermediate shipper, frequently unable to bear the burden, the victim of the discrimination. And so, while the great carriers are establishing rates that give advantage to cities with competitive water routes, the smaller places in the internal agricultural sections will be the losers. As too frequently is the case, the farmers will pay the freight.

Applications have been filed time and time again, some of them pending at this time, to establish rates that would benefit commercial centers favored with water transportation at the expense of interior agricultural sections such as mine, and the long- and short-haul section of the interstate Commerce Act, which this bill was designed to repeal, has been our principal weapon of defense.

Let me cite a few specific examples to illustrate why I believe Representatives from intermediate towns and interior sections should oppose this bill. In recent months efforts have been made to establish lower rates from southern points to such cities as Cincinnati, Louisville, and Huntington, because they are located on the Ohio River, than to points in central Kentucky through which the cars pass before reaching the Ohio River points. Right now there is pending an application to increase the rates on such articles as pipe fittings and connections, in carload and less-than-carload lots, from Birmingham to central Kentucky cities, without corresponding increases to Louisville, Cincinnati, and other points favored by Ohio River competition. It is being proposed now to make carload rates from Birmingham, Ala., to Lexington, Ky., 64 percent higher than the rates to Cincinnati, 82 miles farther, and 6 cents higher than the proposed rail and water rate to New York City, to which the short-line rail distance from Birmingham is more than two and one-half times the distance from Birmingham to Lexington.

The same situation exists as to the other cities and towns in the section of Kentucky of which Lexington is the center and metropolis. Under the existing law they must justify those rates before they can be effective. If this bill passes, it will be unnecessary for them to obtain approval of the proposed increases from the Interstate Commerce Commission beforehand and the burden of prosecuting the protest will be placed upon the central Kentucky cities affected.

Similar increases have been proposed in freight rates to the same interior Kentucky cities on various products of iron and steel, on sugar, coffee, fruits, paper bags, electric irons, livestock, and various commodities necessary to the business life and prosperity of those central Kentucky cities whose business competitors on the Ohio River have the advantage of competitive water transportation. Some of these proposed increases have been defeated by the existence of the present long- and short-haul section of the law. So consistent have been these efforts by the carriers to establish higher rates to and from central Kentucky cities than to and from the more distant Ohio River points that it has been necessary for a number of years for the Lexington Board of Commerce, an organization of the business and commercial interests of that city, to maintain a traffic bureau for the purpose of contesting these attempts to establish rates discriminatory against Lexington and its neighboring central Kentucky cities. But for the long- and short-haul provision it would have been impossible to prevent many burdensome and unfair increases.

In Fourth Section Application No. 1574 (211 I. C. C. 120), decided October 23, 1935, the Commission refused to allow higher rates on electric irons from Leeds, Ala., to interior Kentucky points than to Cincinnati. In Fourth Section Application No. 15746, decided December 7, 1935, the carriers sought permission to increase the rates on machinery from southern producing points to interior Kentucky points, which would have made them higher than the rates to Cincinnati. This application was denied also. The long- and short-haul law, which this bill seeks to repeal, saved the people of central Kentucky from the discriminatory rates sought to be placed upon them. Similar applications covering such commodities as paper and paper articles, including paper bags, important to central Kentucky wholesalers and jobbers, whose competitors are in the Ohio River cities, are now pending, and this bill proposes to place upon businessmen of my section the burden of filing a protest with the Commission and proving that the proposed rates are unreasonable or prejudicial. A few years ago the railroads undertook to make a drastic increase in rates between Lexington, Winchester, Paris, and Georgetown, on one hand, and eastern cities, on the other.

The Lexington Board of Commerce contested on behalf of the Kentucky cities and $50,000 a year was saved for Lexington businessmen, with a corresponding saving for the other central Kentucky cities, when the Interstate Commerce Commission ruled, in 146 I. C. C. 115, that it could not justify such a departure from the long- and short-haul provision of the law. The existence of that provision which these gentlemen seek to repeal today made possible that victory for those cities in the congressional district for which I speak. The enactment of this bill into law would be a staggering blow to them and to thousands of others throughout the country located in interior sections and whose competitors have both rail and water transportation.

There is a new industry in that section; or, rather, an old industry, which has recently awakened from a slumber of some 15 years. I refer to the gigantic distilling industry. I have consulted with rate experts in the Interstate Commerce Commission and am convinced that the passage of this bill would make possible discriminatory freight rates upon the product of the far-famed distilleries of the Bluegrass section of Kentucky, enabling distillers in other parts of the country to market an inferior product with the advantage of lower freight rates.

In my congressional district is the largest loose-leaf tobacco market in the world. Burley tobacco is the principal product of that fertile section. A freight rate differential prejudicial to central Kentucky farmers would be reflected in the price they receive for tobacco, their most valuable product and chief source of income. The rate experts advise that the long- and short-haul clause is a protection against such discrimination.

My congressional district is a great livestock-producing section. Our lambs demand top prices at Jersey City and other eastern points. Livestock shipments constitute a great and profitable industry in that section. There are more than a dozen livestock-auction markets in that congressional district. The farmer with one head of livestock receives the same price as that received by the seller for a thousand head. This marketing system has been of inestimable benefit to livestock producers throughout central Kentucky. Our competing stockyards are located in the larger Ohio River cities. A few years ago an effort was made to increase the rates on livestock from central Kentucky to the East approximately $20 a carload without any corresponding increase from Louisville and Cincinnati, our marketing competitors. At that time the shipments from Lexington alone amounted to 1,000 carloads annually. That increase would have meant a burden of $20,000 a year on the Lexington market alone, all to the advantage of terminal stockyards in larger cities.

The combined shipments from other central Kentucky markets amount to a great deal more than the shipments from Lexington. The approval of such a discriminatory increase to the detriment of central Kentucky markets and for the benefit of the terminal markets would have been equivalent to placing a tax of tens of thousands of dollars per year on the farmers of central Kentucky.

For about a year I have been working in cooperation at this end with a group of farmers and livestock auction market owners in bringing about the establishment at Lexington of a packing plant to slaughter 15,000 lambs a year in addition to a considerable number of veal calves and beef cattle. That plant will soon be in operation. The big packers and terminal markets have seized upon every opportunity for years to crush and destroy the livestock auction markets of central Kentucky. The packers with whom the new packing plant will be in competition are located in Ohio River cities less than 100 miles distant from Lexington. The first thing they will attempt in order to gain an advantage over the new packing enterprise will be to obtain an advantage in freight rates. The present long- and short-haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Act will be the chief bulwark and protection of the livestock producers who have invested their money in the establishment of the new packing plant at Lexington and the thousands of others who sell their stock in the various central Kentucky auction markets. Its repeal would make more difficult the success of such a venture in the interior of Kentucky or in any other interior agricultural region in America.

I cannot but believe that many of you represent districts similarly situated insofar as transportation facilities are concerned. I hope you will consider these illustrations; and I wonder if some of them do not apply with equal force to your districts and equally affect the welfare of the agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests of the people you represent. It is worthy of note that the Interstate Commerce Commission is opposed to this bill. It is worthy of our consideration that the great national organizations of farmers have gone on record in opposition to this bill, and I hope you will not deprive the agricultural interests of interior America of the protection that those interests have been afforded since the adoption of the long- and short-haul clause.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UTTERBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling for this debate to close without going on record in opposition to the bill. I have made quite a little study of it. I have tried to find out what the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission is in reference to the bill. I have tried to find out who is the author of the bill. I have tried to find out what the attitude of the Railroad Coordinator is toward the bill. I find that the Interstate Commerce Commission is opposed to the bill. I find that the Railroad Coordinator is opposed to the bill. I find that this bill was prepared by the railroad executives of this Nation.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UTTERBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I think I can speak on that better than the gentleman. The bill was prepared by the National Industrial Traffic League of America, which represents some 600,000 shippers. It was at their request largely that I introduced the bill.

Mr. UTTERBACK. I may say to the gentleman that I talked to him about a year ago in regard to this bill, and he is my authority for the statement that the railroad executives prepared the bill, and he introduced it at their request.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this legislation is unnecessary.

If the railroads of this Nation have a just complaint, they have a remedy in existing statutes, and I do not need to spend any time on that, because I am sure every one of you knows and understands that.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is not only unnecessary but it is undesirable, and I want to direct your attention to this thought which I do not think has been given consideration here. I think it is very important and it has to do with the far-reaching effect of this legislation. Do not think for a single moment that you are legislating solely and only on a railroad matter here. Remember this fact. We have in this Nation a great system of interlocking directorates in which certain men of this Nation or their associates hold positions as directors of railroads and great banking institutions and at the same time as directors of great industrial institutions. The railroads do not want this bill for nothing. These directors on these railroad boards do not want this bill for nothing. They are interested not only in railroad rates but they are interested in building up a further system here whereby industries competing with the industries they direct through these interlocking boards of directors may not grow and become real competitors of their industries. It is not at all impossible that many of these men, directly or indirectly representing the railroads on these boards of directors, are very much interested in the profits that can be made out of certain lines of industry through the destruction of their competitors, which will be possible under this bill. Mr. Chairman, this is exactly what is going to happen. When you give this power to the railroads, you are giving them the power to do this very thing. I hope this bill will be defeated. [Applause.]

The pro-forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLMES) there were—ayes 37, noes 100.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Immediately following the amendment last adopted, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"No application for any increase in rates, fares, or charges shall be received or considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission unless and until the applicant for such increase in rates, fares, or charges shall show to the Commission that at least 30 days prior to making said application the applicant has filed with the Governor of each State in which said increase will apply a copy of the tariff schedule showing all increases sought in said application, with a memorandum thereto attached explaining each and every increase requested in said application."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, it is said, and it has been said frequently in debate, that it is not intended to increase freight rates generally throughout the country. It has also been brought out that there is a heavy burden resting upon the shippers to watch these rate schedules.

Nearly every State is provided with a corporation commission and the chief executive of that State, charged with the responsibility of taking care of the citizens of the State, when he has these tariff schedules is able to see what effect these increases are going to have in his particular territory and can then, himself, bring to the attention of the shippers the burden that will be resting upon them.

In this connection let me read you the letter that was sent by Mr. McManamy, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the chairman of the committee on H. R. 8100, which was identical with the present bill before the amendment of the committee was added. Commissioner McManamy said:

We are unable to understand how the public interest would be served by the enactment of such a bill. Experience has shown during the years before and since the enactment of the act to regulate commerce in 1887 that special measures are necessary to prevent the peculiar form of undue prejudice and discrimination which may be created by the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer hauls. Section 4 was designed to protect the public against this special kind of prejudice and discrimination.

We are of the opinion that the record of the carriers with respect to the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances during the nearly half a century since the enactment of the original act has fully demonstrated the need for further protection of the shipping public against the kind of discrimination and prejudice resulting from the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances than that afforded generally by the sections of the act other than section 4, and it is our view that the long- and short-haul provision of that section should be continued in force to insure this protection.

Now that you have stricken down the long- and short-haul provision, what is left to protect the people of the country, the shippers of the country, the little man in the country, the fellow in his overalls who is farming the land of the country, the man of whom my friend, Mr. CHAPMAN, of Kentucky, speaks? Why not have this schedule served on the Governor of the State and let him, through the corporation commission, advise the people of his State of the increases that are intended by these applications, the effect this will have upon them, and the steps that they should take for their own protection? They will then be in a position to lodge their complaints, even though they must then bear the burden of the heavy expense of paid attorneys to read tariff schedules which the gentleman for the committee states the presidents themselves are unable to read and construe.

In the interest of the protection of the shipping public of this country I ask that you vote for this amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, there have been several what I think are reasonable amendments offered to this bill that would not have been destructive if they had been adopted, but I do trust the Committee will vote this amendment down and will protect orderly procedure in the Interstate Commerce Commission and the prosecution of its business. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is it not a fact that all proposed rates, whether increase or decrease, must be posted at all distributing points in the territory?

Mr. RAYBURN. My point is that we do not want to bring in any foreign agents in the execution of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Immediately following the amendment last adopted, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"No increase in any rates, fares, or charges shall be permitted to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this section or claiming the benefits of this section unless and until said carrier shall include as railway operating revenues all profits received by it from any subsidiary of said carrier or from any affiliated corporation or from any other corporation in which said carrier owns at least 50 percent of the stock, debentures, or other securities."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to show what operating revenue is coming from sources that should be included.

I want to call attention to the testimony in the hearings on page 584:

The Pacific Fruit Express Co. is owned jointly by the Union Pacific Railroad Co. and the Southern Pacific Co., and owns the refrigerator cars and refrigeration plants necessary to provide refrigerator-car service for those lines and their subsidiaries. The use of these cars includes the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., which serves the heavy producing districts of southern Idaho, as well as districts in Utah and other States. An examination of this statement shows that the capital stock of the Pacific Fruit Express Co. amounts to $24,000,000. The average total value of the property used in its business during the period covered aggregates $118,040,123, the gross operating revenues average over $40,000,000 per year, and the operating expenses over $23,000,000 per year. The average net operating revenues for those years runs over $16,750,000 per year, or better than 14 percent per year on the value of the property used.

Now, they are throwing an increased burden on the people of the country, and I suggest that revenues coming from other sources should be included. There is another case mentioned in this testimony where there are coal mines deriving considerable revenue from these mines that are also owned by the railroads, and these revenues should be taken into consideration in determining these rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GEARHART: Page 2, line 17, after the word "act", strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And provided further, That in any case before the Commission where there is brought in issue a lower rate or charge for transportation of like kind of property for a longer than for a shorter distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance, no such lower rate shall be by the Commission approved until it shall have been established to the satisfaction of the Commission, the burden of proof being upon the carrier, that such lower rate is reasonably compensatory for the service performed."

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, during the debate on this bill numerous speakers in opposition have expressed the fear that it is the intention of the rail carriers to embark upon a campaign of cutthroat competition. Whether or not the fear is well founded is beside the question. It remains, nevertheless, that if the bill now before us is passed and becomes a law the railroads will acquire the power to do just that sort of thing. If the rails want to eliminate other forms of competition, fix rates on the longer haul, say at cost or below cost, they cannot long continue to carry freight on that basis and remain in business, unless they recoup these losses from another source. Therefore, if they do carry freight below cost or just slightly above cost, they are going to look into the intercities, the inland neighborhoods, for the recoupment of the lost revenues which they must recapture somewhere. In other words, they will have to raise the short-haul rates in order to recover that which they sacrificed on the long haul. That is as plain as plain can be.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman realize that on all the short hauls the truck operators can make rates and will make rates and offer the rates to the Commission that will hold down any extraordinary advance in rates that the railroads attempt to put in? Will not that be the practical application of this bill?

Mr. GEARHART. The trucks will soon be under regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and you can rest assured that the truck rates will be fixed with due regard to the rail problem by that body. Unlimited competition will not be permitted. I still maintain, and it is inescapable and unanswerable, that if the railroads reduce charges on the long hauls to a point so low that the rates fall below the cost of the transportation service, the sacrificed revenues will have to be recouped from another source. The short-haul shipper will necessarily have to be the victim of this unjust system of robbing Peter to pay Paul. There is no escape open to him. All I hope to accomplish by this amendment is the protection of the shipper who is compelled to use rail transportation where there is no water competition; the shipper who must rely upon the rails and the rails alone. This amendment, if adopted, will protect him from being victimized and gouged and save him from outrageous rates—rates imposed in order that the railroads may carry on their cutthroat competition with competing carriers on the long hauls. This, it is said, is impossible. It is said there will not be any cutthroat competition indulged in. If that is true, if the railroads are seeking reasonable compensation for the services they render, they should have no objection whatsoever to the enactment of the amendment which I now propose. Why should it not be enacted? Should they carry below cost, somebody must pay the bill, and it is going to be the interior people, the people who live in the Rocky Mountains, in the interior of California, in the interior of every State in this Union that is not so fortunate as to enjoy an intercompeting combination of facilities—water, air, and rail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The question arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Immediately following the amendment last adopted insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Before any carrier shall be permitted to charge at any point, where it is in competition with water-borne commerce, less than its present rate, fare, or charge, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall require notice to be given the water carrier and the community that may be affected by such rate, fare, or charge, and it must be affirmatively shown by said railroad carrier that the proposed rate, fare, or charge will provide a fair return to the water carrier if a similar rate, fare, or charge is put into effect by the water carrier."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is only one other amendment which I feel the gentlemen on the committee will accept. [Laughter.]

The purpose of this amendment is to protect the water-borne commerce of the United States. It has frequently been said in this debate that it is not the intention of the proponents of the bill to try to destroy water-borne commerce. I provide then that notice shall be given water carriers at competitive points, that the matter shall be investigated, and that no rate, fare, or charge shall be permitted to be put into effect by the railroad carriers which would destroy the water carriers if a similar rate, fare, or charge should be put into effect by the water carriers at the competitive points.

This is what Coordinator Eastman had to say in a speech made by him in April 1934:

So far as water transportation is concerned, you know what happened in the past, when the railroads had a free hand and swept the inland waterways practically free of competing craft. In an open fight, without let or hindrance, the advantage lies with the form of transportation which has the largest reserves of traffic upon which other transportation agencies can encroach. And with all the competition by which they are beset, the railroads still have the edge in that respect.

In that connection I suggest that you who have the interest of water transportation at heart may well keep an eye on the attempts which are being made to wipe out the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act. I venture the suggestion lest there be a repetition of our early experience with destructive competition.

When Mr. Tilford, one of the witnesses for the railroads, was before the committee he was asked who was going to be hurt by the repeal of the clause. He answered, "Well, the only ones are probably the water carriers."

Mr. Eastman, in his report in 1934, page 170, further said:

Federal regulation of the railroads was precipitated in 1887 primarily by the then widespread and flagrant discriminations in rates and charges. Prominent among these discriminations which had created intense dissatisfaction was the common practice of charging less for long hauls than for shorter hauls to or from intermediate points on the same line or route even when the route was direct.

I am asking gentlemen who have appeared on this floor who say that it is not their purpose to destroy water-borne commerce, to make good their words and do that which will not destroy water-borne commerce.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I just wanted to say to the gentleman from Virginia that there is at least one member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who thinks that water-borne traffic will be perfectly safe on the score of regulation as long as it is in the hands of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BLAND. I thank the gentleman very much, but we cannot get very far without ample cooperation of the Members of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Immediately following the amendment last adopted insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"This act shall be known as an act to destroy the American merchant marine and all water-borne commerce in the United States, and to increase rates, fares, and charges throughout the United States."

Mr. BLAND. All I have to say about this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is that, of course, the author of the bill, with his usual generosity and his belief in truth, will accept this amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GEARHART: Page 2, line 6, after the word "upon", strike out all of lines 7, 8, and 9, to and including the colon following the word "Commission", and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall not be affected by reason of the provisions of this section until, after hearing, of which due and prior notice of proposed changes shall be given, the Commission shall otherwise determine."

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, this proposed amendment I conceive to be in the nature of a clarifying amendment. I read the following language from page 2 of the bill:

And provided further, That rates, fares, or charges existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act, by virtue of orders of the Commission or as to which application has theretofore been filed with the Commission and not yet acted upon, shall not be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section until the further order of or a determination by the Commission.

I believe the phrase "shall not be required to be changed" is uncertain as to exact meaning and that it will throw the Commission into confusion when they attempt to interpret it. I believe, furthermore, the old rates should remain in effect until people who might object to a change have had notice of the proposed change and have had a chance to be heard. I have provided, therefore, simply that the old rate shall remain in effect until proposed changes are made known to those who have an interest of the subject matter of the rate schedules, in order that they may have an opportunity to exercise their right to come before the Commission and state their views; that snap judgment be not taken against them. Is there anything unreasonable about that?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, discussion on this bill seems to have been limited to those who have had experience in railroad service. We have had conductors, engineers, and firemen speak for and against this bill. I felt like I was not doing my duty, Mr. Chairman, not to represent the snipe element of America in this debate. I served in this capacity on a railroad for a year. A snipe is what railroad men call a section hand. By assiduous application I rose, after 1 year's service, to the dignified position of trackwalker; and I want to give you the trackwalkers' and the snipes' viewpoint on this legislation. [Laughter.]

It occurs to me, having sandwiched in a little law experience, that we are just reversing the order of things in this proposed legislation. Ordinarily in law procedure if a man goes into court he does so with a petition. He files a petition and after awhile he hopes for a judgment. In this proceeding the railroad company is given the right to go in there first and file its judgment, and then give the other fellow the opportunity to go in and, if he can, set the judgment aside. The railroad, under this bill, announces the rate it is going to charge to or from a particular point, and this becomes the rate unless the merchants and shippers send rate experts and lawyers to Washington to have the Interstate Commerce Commission give them a hearing to see if the rates are too high. This is not right. It developed during the discussion that one of the objects of the railroad company is to do away with truck lines. I think this is one of the purposes of the bill. Their object is to get rid of all truck competition and put them out of business. Out in my section of the country we have learned to depend almost wholly upon truck lines and truck operators to get our freight delivered to us, and we are apprehensive that if the railroad company is given the right to put its rates in operation in our small inland communities that it is going to be incumbent not only on our communities in the Middle West but on every community in the United States to hire an expert rate man and to hire a lawyer to come to Washington and defend them, to try to set aside this judgment the railroad expects to obtain in this unusual way, fixing a rate charge on carrying freight and passengers into these various communities. Under these circumstances, and in the interest of the ordinary truckman in this country, I expect to vote against this piece of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. If my colleague from Oklahoma will permit, let me say that he is making a very interesting and informative address. He has shown very clearly that there are two sides to this bill. Although I am interested in protecting the rights of railroad employees, we must also bear in mind that our farmers and shippers must be protected. Now, does not the gentleman think that one of the main purposes of this bill is to raise freight rates?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes; I think so; and, as I stated awhile ago in my argument, the railroads will fix this freight rate and then it will be incumbent upon your town and my town and every other locality in the United States to keep a lawyer or an expert in Washington. As the law now is, the Interstate Commerce Commission gives every reasonable request of the railroads to raise rates reasonable consideration. Under this bill the railroads make the increase in rates themselves and communities affected must spend money to see if the rate fixed should be set aside.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot permit my beloved friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] to get away with the proposition that he is the only "snipe" in this distinguished body. In case the Members do not know what a "snipe" is, I may say he is an individual who handles a type of shovel known as a no. 2. I sniped for a year at $1.10 a day for 10 long hours each day, and when it comes to the "snipe" vote in this body it is going to be a tie.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I just want to say to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] that I object to the gentleman getting on my preserves. He qualified as a coal shoveler or as a fireman. I reserve my right to speak as a "snipe."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But I handled a no. 2 first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GEARHART: On page 2, line 9, after the colon and following the word "Commission", insert: "And provided further, That no carrier shall put into effect any rate which is lower for the longer distance than for a shorter, the shorter being included in the longer, without first submitting such proposal for such rates or charges and securing from such Commission, after public notice and public hearing, authority to establish such rates."

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take 5 minutes. I have already sensed the temper of this body. I fully realize that the offering of this amendment will probably constitute love's labor lost; however, I do think it is a sound amendment. I ask the Members, therefore, to consider it seriously.

Mr. Chairman, all that I hope to accomplish by the amendment which I have offered is to make certain that the people of the United States shall have due notice of what is being done under the provisions of the law which is, it is now apparent, about to be passed. The amendment simply provides that before any schedule of rates shall go into effect under the provisions of this bill due and public notice shall be given and public hearings shall be had. Is that not fair?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is that not the rule today in connection with all rate schedules?

Mr. GEARHART. Then the gentleman should have no objection to the amendment. I do not so understand the bill.

If the gentleman believes that my amendment goes no further than the law already provides for, will he not, on behalf of the committee, accept my proposal?

Mr. PETTENGILL. And is not everybody advised now?

Mr. GEARHART. Certainly the gentleman should have no objection to my amendment if he believes that notice is provided for and hearings are guaranteed by existing law. I am far from being satisfied of it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILCOX, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3263) to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4), pursuant to House Resolution 435, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment agreed to in Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOLMES. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOLMES moves to recommit the bill H. R. 3263 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to that committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this part to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property for a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this part; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this part to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the Commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PETTENGILL) there were—ayes 215, noes 41.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H. R. 3263

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, if the careful study that I have given to the pending amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act had left me at all apprehensive that its passage might result in a return to past discriminatory and unsocial practices on the part of the railroads, I should certainly have been one of the last Members of this House to give it my support. I am thoroughly convinced of the necessity in the public interest of reasonable, adequate, and effective regulation of all public utilities that partake of the nature of a monopoly, but I am also convinced that the same public interest requires a reappraisal from time to time of the details of such governmental regulation to the end that it may not operate as a detriment instead of a help.

The extensive hearings that were held on this bill have persuaded me that no public interest will suffer and many helpful results may come from a relaxation of the rigorous provisions of section 4. I believe the producers, shippers, and consumers of the Middle West will profit by the long-haul rate readjustments that this change in the law will make possible. The objections to this amendment originally interposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission have been fully met by the amendment to the bill which specifically continues the burden of proof upon the carriers to justify any long-haul rate against any claim that the same may constitute undue preference or discrimination under sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act. Furthermore, there is no doubt that competing agencies are now so general that undue preference or discrimination will be effectually prevented.

The railroads are obviously the backbone of our national transportation system, and if we are to avoid public ownership and operation we must afford the private managers thereof every reasonable opportunity to recover their lost traffic and to enhance their gross revenue to a point that will again make their properties self-sustaining.

I look upon this legislation as a substantial effort in the direction of national recovery. It gives promise of increased employment in the most important of our private industries, and should also strengthen its position as the largest taxpayer contributing to the support of our schools and of our State and local governments. The bill will receive my vote.

THE AIR CORPS OF THE ARMY

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (H. R. 11140) to provide more effectively for the national defense by further increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. McREYNOLDS, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. DRIVER (at the request of Mr. MILLER) for remainder of the week on account of the death of his brother.

To Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHANNON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. Sisson (at the request of Mr. O'CONNOR) on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 25, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O loving Father, we would exalt the Lord our God, for it is He who hath made us; stretch forth Thy hand from above and lead us in Thy way everlasting. Make manifest to us what is entire truth, honor, and fidelity. Forgive us our sins and let us not brood over our faults, but do Thou come and establish Thy kingdom within us. Enter the palace of our hearts; clothe us with the armor of light, and then we shall easily triumph over the irritable spirit, the glow of self-love and intemperate speech. Eternal Spirit, we earnestly seek understanding, affection, and strength which only Thy presence can excite and sustain. Each day help us to catch the vision of a better country coming through righteousness, cooperation, justice, and manly endeavor. In the name of our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11418. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 4212. An act to amend section 2 of the National Housing Act, relating to the insurance of loans and advances for improvements upon real property, and for other purposes.

COMMEMORATION OF THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY OF ALBANY, N. Y.

Mr. CORNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7690) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Albany, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Albany, N. Y., there shall be coined by the Director of the Mint 10,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and fineness of a special appropriate design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage.

Sec. 2. The coins herein authorized shall be issued at par and only upon the request of the committee, person, or persons duly authorized by the mayor of the city of Albany, N. Y.

Sec. 3. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by the committee, person, or persons duly authorized by said mayor of Albany, N. Y., and all proceeds shall be used in furtherance of the commemoration of the founding of the city of Albany, N. Y., projects.

Sec. 4. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same; regulating and guarding the process of coinage; providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins; for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting; for the security of the coin; or for any other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein directed.

Sec. 5. The coins authorized herein shall be issued in such numbers, and at such times as they shall be requested by the committee, person, or persons duly authorized by said mayor of Albany, N. Y., and upon payment to the United States of the face value of such coins.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty-five."
Page 2, line 4, strike out "the committee, person, or persons" and in lieu thereof insert "a committee of not less than three persons."

Page 2, line 8, strike out "person, or persons."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF WIDOWS, ORPHANS, AND DEPENDENTS OF PERSONS WHO DIED IN THE FLORIDA HURRICANE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 464

Resolved, That the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, or any subcommittee thereof, during hearings on the bill H. R. 9486, entitled "A bill for the relief of widows, children, and dependent parents of World War veterans who died as the result of the Florida hurricane at Windley Island and Matecumbe Keys, September 2, 1935", is authorized to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents by subpoena or otherwise and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives or the chairman of said committee, and shall be served by any person designated by them or either of them. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the provisions contained in said bill H. R. 9486, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102, chapter 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the gentleman from Mississippi getting this evidence, but it seems to me that the effect of this resolution is to give the committee special authority for an investigation which will eventually call upon Congress for an expenditure of money. If the witnesses come to Washington, they will at least have to be paid their expenses.

Mr. RANKIN. It is not the intention of the chairman of the committee to incur any expense at all. If we do have to incur expenses and bring witnesses here, I expect to come back to the House for an appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. According to the provisions of the resolution, the committee has the right to incur expenses, and it seems to me the investigation—that is practically what it is, regardless of what gentlemen say—it ought to go to the Committee on Rules. However, the chairman of the Rules Committee is here, and if he does not care anything about it, I do not.

Mr. RANKIN. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that we have the bill before the committee to compensate the dependents of the veterans who lost their lives in that hurricane, and it will probably be the only congressional record or record of a congressional committee that you will have bearing on this subject.

I am merely asking for permission to require the attendance of witnesses and have them testify under oath so that the House and the country may have a sworn record to show what did transpire and who, if anyone, was at fault, as best we can.

Mr. SNELL. You are going to make an investigation of that situation?

Mr. RANKIN. That is my intention.

Mr. SNELL. Then that should come from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SHORT. Does the chairman of the committee think it possible to acquire a sufficient amount of this evidence without incurring expense?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not think we would have to incur any expense. I think the witnesses will all appear voluntarily.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have not seen the resolution, but, as I understand it, it relates to the disaster caused by the flood on the coast of Florida last year?

Mr. RANKIN. Last September.

Mr. MAY. Does it in any way affect the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act which was passed at the close of the last session of the Seventy-third Congress?

Mr. RANKIN. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CINCINNATI, OHIO, AS A MUSIC CENTER

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3699) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a center of music, and its contribution to the art of music for the past 50 years, and for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3699, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary in 1936 of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a center of music, and to commemorate Cincinnati's contribution to the art of music in the United States for the past 50 years, there shall be coined, at the mints of the United States, silver 50-cent pieces to the number of not more than 15,000, such 50-cent pieces to be of the standard troy weight, composition, diameter, device, and such design as shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the Cincinnati Musical Center Commemorative Coin Association, of Cincinnati, Ohio, upon payment by such Cincinnati Musical Center Commemorative Coin Association of the par value of such coins, and it shall be permissible for the said Cincinnati Musical Center Commemorative Coin Association to obtain said coins upon said payment, all at one time or at separate times, and in separate amounts, as it may determine.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating the guarding and process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 was the assent given by the Congress to President Roosevelt's demand that the Federal Government must and shall quit this business of relief.

Following the passage of this act the President, by an Executive order on May 6, 1935, established within the Government certain agencies and described their respective functions and duties in carrying out a Federal relief program.

Under this order the Works Progress Administration was set up and made responsible to the President for the honest, efficient, speedy, and coordinated execution as a whole and for the execution of that program in such a manner as to remove from the relief rolls to work projects or in private employment the maximum number of persons in the shortest time possible. Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, as Administrator, was charged with the duty of seeing to it that this part of the President's order was complied with.

Today Mr. Hopkins can face the President with a clear conscience—the duty he accepted he has performed. There are various vaguely mouthed charges against Mr. Hopkins' administration, but whenever those hurling the charges are asked to substantiate them they have failed to do so. Not one definite, specific charge has ever been proved, nor is there any evidence that these charges are ever inspired by anything more tangible than political ambition.

It was the task of the Works Progress Administration to recommend and carry on useful projects designed to assure a maximum of employment in all localities. The report of the Works Progress Administration for the week ending February 22, 1936, bears witness to how well this task has been achieved.

On the week ending February 22, 1936, 3,037,440 competent and able American workers were employed on the program of the Works Progress Administration.

When President Roosevelt said that no able-bodied citizens were to be allowed to deteriorate on relief but must be given jobs, he meant women as well as men.

As proof of the realization of his injunction, the Works Progress Administration reports that 407,777 women are at work on its program.

By the 1st day of January of this year, according to the last report issued by the Works Progress Administration on this subject, there were 69,152 work projects selected for operation.

Additions and improvements to public property constitute 86 percent of all the projects on which funds of the Works Progress Administration are being spent.

Highways, roads, and streets, as a classification, lead all other types of projects selected, with 39.5 percent being devoted to this purpose; parks and playgrounds, public buildings, and water supply and sewer systems follow, respectively, with 11.6, 9.9, and 9.6 percent each. The Works Progress Administration reports further that 19 percent of the total cost of projects is being contributed by sponsors.

Out of a total project cost of $1,169,650,880 the report states $221,918,153 is being put up by the States and communities.

The type and quality of the projects and the work done, in spite of muttered faultfinding, is self-evident. It is notable that no project has been successfully attacked in the community in which it is being carried out. Each and every project approved, with the exception of a few federally sponsored undertakings operated on a Nation-wide scale, originate with some responsible body in the community. That they have more than a moral interest in these projects is shown by the fact that they have laid good, hard cash or its equivalent on the line in order to get the work done. Any attack upon the character of the project is an arraignment of its community sponsors.

The report shows that sponsors' support was greatest in those projects requiring a considerable amount of material and equipment.

W. P. A. IN NEW YORK STATE

So much for the Nation-wide picture of W. P. A. I know in my own State of New York a splendid job is being done. In New York State, exclusive of New York City, nearly 134,000 men and women are at work under the W. P. A. New York City has nearly 243,000 at work. New York State is particularly proud of the way W. P. A. handled the catastrophe which fell upon thousands of people almost before W. P. A. had the bare outlines of its organization established. Early in July torrential rains poured down upon the State. The death and destruction that resulted is still and will for a long time be fresh in the public mind. Many agencies responded to that situation. W. P. A. was called upon and without hesitation established a fund of $1,000,000.

The people in my State know only too well the magnificent job done by W. P. A. workers. The traveler today sees in those stricken sections the results of W. P. A. executives, engineers, and laborers' work. The damage has not only been repaired but better and more substantial bridges than those which were washed away have been built; better roads than those which cracked and disappeared under the flood have been constructed; ruined playgrounds have been rebuilt; and public property on every hand shows the mark of W. P. A.'s great humane activity.

Those of us who know first-hand what the W. P. A. really is and really does are getting very fed up with critics who base their wild-haired statements on third- and fourth-hand rumors that they hear over the teacups. For example, it is an easy matter to remark about the problem of W. P. A. employment as "all political"; but the truth is, every worker, except for necessary administrative employees, must be taken from the relief rolls, certified by the county welfare authorities, and registered by the National Reemployment Service, which operates in conjunction with the New York State Labor Department. W. P. A. receives its workers through this careful and necessary procedure of certification as to eligibility and classification as to employment capacity. If people who are trying so hard not to understand the fundamentals of the W. P. A. program will remember that somebody has to feed and clothe the vast number who are willing to work but cannot find jobs in private industry, they will be a long way toward knowing why the Government has undertaken the works program.

These needy people might continue on a home-relief dole in their localities, but everybody knows what happens to a person who is willing and anxious to work and who is forced to remain idle.

W. P. A. has absorbed the unemployment load as quickly as communities have asked for projects to put the jobless to work. It has taken over the tax burden which would accrue to the locality were the entire unemployed group left on relief. While W. P. A. workers are building roads, bridges, improving streets, schools, public buildings, playgrounds, parks, and myriad other useful activities, they are performing tasks that would have to be done now or at some future time. In this way they are very definitely and very clearly saving the taxpayer the double cost of paying a dole now and paying for the necessary work that would have to be done at some future time.

I want to say that Mr. Hopkins, as the Federal W. P. A. Administrator, and Mr. Lester W. Herzog, New York State W. P. A. administrator, have provided an amazing example of cooperation between the Federal, State, and local governments. In effect, Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Herzog were given several hundred thousand workers and told to put them to work on useful tasks in the communities. In finding useful jobs for these workers, they have used logic, reason, and the best brand of American common sense. They have said to the communities: "Here are many willing workers. What would you, as communities, like them to do for you?"

Well, the communities of New York State have asked the Works Progress Administration to do almost every kind of public work under the sun. I want to emphasize that these projects in my State are what the communities have asked for. The responsible officials and leaders of business and civic organizations of the communities, of course, realize that only such projects as the people on relief can do are being done.

In communities that have had mainly unskilled laborers on the relief rolls, the projects naturally have to be mostly the kind that unskilled laborers can do, but it is astounding to see the ingenuity that has been applied by W. P. A. officials in helping the communities to put the wide variety of workers at work on projects that the communities have asked for.

Of course, W. P. A. has made mistakes; of course, there have been minor frictions and errors of human judgment, but I do not know of any organization in the country that is more ready to investigate complaints and, what is more important, to get right down to the bottom of the trouble, wherever there is trouble, and correct the situation. It is a habit with some people to say, "Let us know if everything is not all right" and then completely ignore any complaints. But I know that the W. P. A. means what it says and has quickly responded to constructive criticism. I refer to the recent action of Administrator Herzog in his administrative correction of the situation in Buffalo.

THE SITUATION AT BUFFALO, N. Y.

From information which I have recently received, both from Albany and Washington, the W. P. A. inquiry at Buffalo is practically completed. Any investigation which might be initiated either by the Senate or the House would not necessarily involve the Buffalo area, because the W. P. A. set-up has been overhauled and revamped according to a standard set-up approved by Harry L. Hopkins, the W. P. A. chieftain.

As I understand it, the new W. P. A. set-up at Buffalo and throughout the United States will consist of a director and four principal department heads, which will include finance, engineering, personnel, and a women's division. This division of responsibilities, superceding the confusion that took place in the original set-up, will make for greater efficiency. It will concentrate in each department the responsibilities that rightfully belong there.

Mr. Hopkins made it very clear that so far as W. P. A. is concerned, politics, patronage, and political contributions are forbidden under penalty of dismissal. In a recent statement, copy of which has been sent to my office, Mr. Hopkins advises that political contributions simply cannot be solicited from W. P. A. employees, administrative or other workers, and anybody found doing it anywhere in the United States will be fired.

One of the principal causes for the investigation at Buffalo resulted from charges from a number of sources to the effect that W. P. A. workers were making contributions, either directly or in the purchase of tickets, for political purposes. While this may not be in violation of the law, it was in violation of the principles upon which the work-relief program came into being. It was the express wish of the President, and in most cases an appeal that has been carried out, that politics be kept out of relief; and after reflection, most any fair-minded man will agree with the President's attitude. At any rate, Buffalo's W. P. A., free from patronage and politics, should operate more efficiently in the future than it did in the past. No criticism was ever directed, to my knowledge, at the director, Mr. Downing, who is well thought of both here and at Albany.

I am in hopes that Congress will provide for a continuation of W. P. A. until such time as private enterprise takes up the slack in employment. Every citizen is a potential customer in the American market, and unless he is employed by private business, work must be provided for him by the Government. The construction of streets, flood-control work, bridges, public buildings, parks, recreational centers, and the like, will have a tendency to redistribute the wealth and ease the burden on our local taxpayers. While I favor increasing the wages of W. P. A. workers and shall continue to do so, we must continue this Federal agency as long as our people in large numbers are without work.

I will be glad to carry out, so far as I am concerned, Mr. Hopkins' instructions with regard to politics and patronage in W. P. A. Personally, I do not believe that any Member of the House or of the Senate, either Republican or Democrat, will take issue with Mr. Hopkins in his desire to free the W. P. A. from politics.

W. P. A., like any new agency, made mistakes, but profiting quickly by experience it is becoming more efficient as time passes. I favor its continuance until such time as industry provides work for our unemployed.

For quick action in an emergency the W. P. A. affords the best opportunity of restoring our unemployed to gainful occupation; for the long pull W. P. A. is an effective instrumentality.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 465 (Rept. No. 2231)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11689, a bill to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN].

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for today, but with the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN] the Chair is recognizing these requests for unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF AND CHARITY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN], under special order, is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am somewhat presumptuous in attacking the matter that I have in my mind and heart today. Perhaps it might somehow become a matter of personality between myself and my natural, innate emotions and passions, and the unadulterated unfitness of some authorities in the District of Columbia so far as concerns the matter of charity. And, too, it might appear more like a freshman question, but, to say the least, it is one that has encountered the depths of my soul for more than 90 days. It is a matter that has caused me to respond definitely, almost daily, because of some people in the District who seem to discount the importance of a person looking for bread. I ask that you follow me just for the next few moments and I shall tell you about a place in the city of Washington and paint to you a picture so appalling, so miserable, so absolutely shameful, as it concerns our Nation in the matter of charity, that I am sure you will forgive me if and in the event I have overindulged your patience.

I have not been boisterous since I became a freshman in this Congress. I have tried so much to be patient. I have been the recipient of so many kind and courteous favors from my senior colleagues until it makes me feel faintly when I attack questions which, as a matter of fact, have been gone over from time to time in the House.

I want you to go with me to a place down at 311 D Street NW., in the city of Washington. I want you to keep that address in your minds, if you will, please—311 D Street NW.—and while I shall not in any way try to emulate any masterful touch of the brush of an Angelo, I do want to fix it, from a common-sense standpoint, in your minds, as one who believes in pure, undefiled humanitarianism. And to those of you who believe that people in this country, native-born, have a right to eat, have a right to go yonder to charitable institutions, the appropriations for which are furnished by this body, and there seek out, according to the law and order of things, according to the mandates of a given social compact, the right of a mother to have solace and comfort in the birth of her child I make this appeal. I said I wanted you to go with me to 311 D Street, Washington. I am not going into detail on the appropriations that might have gone to the District of Columbia in the matter of charities. I have no condemnation for any particular official or any group of officials. I am only going to give you, as an ex-service man who gave his time in the World War, the facts about a situation which you will say, as a matter of fact, does not exist here in Washington.

Seventy-two days ago a man came to my office. He had read in the Congressional Directory that I was an ex-service man and had been twice post commander of T. C. Carter Post, No. 21, of Meridian, Miss. He came clad in overalls.

The look upon his face showed some sort of mental and physical anguish. He told me he was without food. He told me that he gave 20 months of his life in the service of the World War, and was physically emaciated because of having been shell-shocked. I noticed an impediment in his speech. I also noticed that there was that something present which I have too often seen in the faces of such men.

I left my office, and I went with him to 311 D Street, Washington, D. C., and there I found, in a little room some 10 by 10 feet square, a little woman from Newport, Tenn., Mr. Speaker, and four babies, the youngest of which seemed to be about 15 months old. I saw the pallor on those faces. I saw the emaciation that was written all over their bodies. I saw everything that had to do with starvation and poverty. Perhaps some of you saw in the newspapers the condition of this family, because I saw fit to have it published in order that they might have something to eat. I got busy, and my friends provided them with something to eat. I went down to the authorities and asked that the man be given a job. I phoned one of the Commissioners—from my home State, if you please. I am making no apologies. I said, "Give him a job. I have investigated his war record. I find that he is shell-shocked. Why can he not get a job?" They said, "Congressman, we will get him a job within the next few days." I have worked and fought day in and day out to get that man, by name, Everett Parker, a job, and today he is without it, even though any number of people were put to work during the flood period. But that is only part of it. I saw this man's wife, who is about 26 years old, with those four little babies huddling close to her lap, living there in the lamplight of poverty.

This man Parker of whom I speak, her husband, is not a chap that could become an executive. He perhaps could not do ordinary clerical work which oftentimes we find men can do under some circumstances. In fact, I found that he could not even read or write. I found further on day before yesterday that this man from Newport, Tenn., about whom I am speaking and who served his time in the World War, went to an executive in the District of Columbia who said, "You are from Tennessee and you ought to be back there on a farm." God knows, when I heard that, I wondered how many other big executives in the city of Washington ought to be back on the farm following a hard-tail mule. [Applause.]

Well, time passed. I spoke to them about the appropriations we had made insofar as charities are concerned, having at the same time the picture of this little woman and her babies sleeping, if you please, in two smutty three-quarter beds in one little room, where there were no sanitary facilities; no running water, all huddled there together. This family is living there today. That is the reason I asked you to take the address. I found, as I say, that this little woman was about to become a mother again. I immediately rushed down to the place where the man Everett Parker had told me they threw him out, the Public Health unit, because he came and dared ask that his wife be taken from a manger into the comfort of the society supposed to be civilized and there allowed to give birth to her own flesh. I found the man, Parker, had practically told me the truth, except they did not run me out. They were nice to me. I got a permit for her to go to the hospital. In the meantime, however, there were some physical conditions which arose which perhaps did not demand her immediate reception at the hospital; matters which, in fact, I know about personally, and which, of course, would not be proper to divulge here. She was told to go back home and there to repose herself as best she could until she came to that particular period in her life which every woman who knows motherhood must face, and then to come back.

So day before yesterday, if you please, there in this manger, there in this place a baby girl was born. I took three witnesses with me, and at the same time we saw four other little babies looking out of iron bars begging Almighty God somehow to get them into the sunlight. They were pallid and rat eaten, so to speak, and a further description of the synthetic maternity ward was beyond human description.

She had her baby, nobody attending her during hours of labor; nobody by her side then except that man who walked yonder in the war valley where the poppies somehow give off a new blood color to the taproot and make it redder by virtue of the selfsame blood that gave this country birth; and this morning she is there in that manger. Why, she has been feeding all of her babies on oatmeal soup for a week, please God, with the aid of her husband while she lies there without any sort of comfort whatever other than the comfort provided by a private physician on yesterday here in the great city of Washington. No doubt her husband was urging this mighty Nation, with its billions for charitable purposes, to come and keep her away from the valley where the shadows of old Gethsemane never fade. She lies there and her husband cannot get work. If she lives until tomorrow evening she will be a most fortunate woman.

Oh, perhaps many of you are not interested in this. Perhaps you may think it is a personal thing I desire to say in order to get in the RECORD; but, bless your souls, I do not have to get in the RECORD in this case, because it has been my life since I came out of the war, and it will continue to be my life so long as I am physically able to be about and do these things. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want to say to the gentleman that the House is interested. Very few Members have had such an attentive and sympathetic hearing as the gentleman is receiving.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman. There is nothing I can do. I have been to every particular place I can go. I have sent the man Parker with every sign and figure to these various charitable agencies for relief and they all send him away and tell him, Mr. Speaker, to go back to Newport, Tenn. Well, when did Washington cease to become a transient town? When did it cease to become a mecca for all those people who are entitled to come to the National Capital? Perhaps some of my fellow men are here from Mississippi, perhaps some are here from New York, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere; but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that whenever motherhood in this Nation is crucified on a cross of poverty, God help all of us. There is a day coming and we have got to reckon with it.

I have not been able to get him a job, but I will say to you that I have investigated him from every possible angle. I have not found him in any wise other than thoroughly amenable to everything they have told him to do. He is not a sorehead.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. STUBBS. This may not be strictly in order, but if there are 100 Congressmen here who feel as I do, I would like them to stand with me each to give $1 to this family.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman for his interest.

I am only one Congressman, and a freshman at that, but why is it with all the millions we have voted to resuscitate, to rehabilitate, and to rebuild bodies which have become emaciated because of this depression, how is it one cannot get an attentive ear when one sends a man to these agencies, an ex-service man at that? I do not say that because of this he should receive preferential treatment, but to say the least he is a man who offered his all on the battlefield for his country; yet now, he, his wife, and children have got to live in something worse than a manger for the wife to give birth to a child. No wonder Lincoln exclaimed, if I am right in my recollection of the author's name, that God made so many poor people because he knew he had ultimately to repose all of his faith in them. Surely this is a fact.

I am sorry I had to bring this matter to you. I know of no remedial recourse I can take. I do not know where the trouble is. I do not know whether it is the result of just pure unadulterated meanness on the part of officials, whether it is the result of lack of money, whether it is the result of red tape, or what; but whatever it may be it is the result of somebody's carelessness, negligence, and lack of recognition of fellowship, of kindness, and pure Christianity.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. PEARSON. I have been very much interested in what the gentleman has had to say in view of the fact I happen to be a member of the Tennessee delegation. Does the gentleman know from what section of Tennessee this man and his family hail?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. From Newport, Tenn.

Mr. PEARSON. Did the gentleman make inquiry as to what effort this man and his family made to obtain relief from the relief agencies which are operating in the vicinity of Newport, Tenn.?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Yes; he tells me he has brought himself within every particular category a human being could bring himself in to get relief and work. It does not matter that he comes from Newport, Tenn.; he could have come from my State.

It is just a proposition of pure, unadulterated, and damnable red tape that will let a man starve to death and a mother be crucified with her own flesh and blood at her breast. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARSON. May I say to the gentleman, in order that there may be no reflection on my own State, that the people of Tennessee make it one of their objectives in life to look after those in their midst who are unable to properly care for themselves.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. PEARSON. I want to say further that there is not a single member of the Tennessee delegation in this House who is not ready and willing to cooperate with the gentleman and with any agency of this House for the purpose of seeing that this man and his family are properly taken care of.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. And then some. There is no doubt in the world about that; and that is why I referred to the proposition of the authorities here saying that this man ought to return to Newport, Tenn., and to the plow. I put my finger in the face of the man who made that statement, and I said, "My dear brother, if I had my way about it you would be under the plow. They would plow you under, and you would not have the opportunity to make that statement."

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I should like to suggest to the gentleman that the city of Washington has a welfare organization at the head of which is a man by the name of Elwood Street. He is a former Kentuckian, having come from Louisville. During the World War he did a great deal of work among the veterans. May I inquire if the gentleman has contacted Mr. Street personally?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. No; I have not; but I have been to the public-health unit, I have been to Gallinger Hospital, and to every hospital. All I can say is that I hope somewhere, sometime this baby may have a chance.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have heard with a great deal of interest the able remarks, the sympathetic, kindly, and true remarks, of the gentleman. If I can help in any way, I am willing to do it, and I am also willing to subscribe any money that may be necessary toward helping this man to whom the gentleman from Mississippi has just referred.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I wish the Members would take this address. They are not so big in this Congress that they cannot become human. The address is 311 D Street NW. I want you to behold that situation down there. Look at it, see how it is, and observe how we are letting this family go into a period of disintegration.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to make the suggestion to the Members of the House, and I know it will be productive of results, that those who are interested telephone Mr. Cleary, in charge of W. P. A., at the District Building. I am certain if that is done we will get results.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I promise that I am not going to stop until something is done.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. Is not some difficulty in the red tape which results from the modernizing of some of these charitable agencies which spend a great deal of overhead doing what is called "case work"? I remember one of them saying to me at one time that I would be surprised at the number of people they prevent getting relief. I agreed with that statement, but I said I would rather be surprised if you told me the number of people they were actually giving relief.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. Speaker, may I say in conclusion that there is not any sinister feeling on my part in this matter, but I do know that I have been down to the District Building during the past 60 days. I have been with this man. I saw 250 people put to work with this man standing in line, and by the grace of everything that is sacred, he was thrown aside simply because of the fact they had given him $40 some time back in December. I have no more to say at this time.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under a special order today I have 15 minutes in which to address the House. I now ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 5 minutes, so that I may fully answer the gentleman who has just spoken.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object to this time—we have a rather full program today, and I trust there will not be further requests to speak out of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes, which was granted by unanimous consent. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to speak for an additional 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman who has just preceded me appeals to everyone's heart, and no one here can understand why a condition of that kind should exist. To be told, as we have just been told, that a World War veteran and his family, his wife about to give birth to a child, are destitute, not only of the comforts but of the necessities of life, and that the wife, at least, is suffering in her extremity because of a lack of medical care and aid, and that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN] has been unable to procure for a family here in Washington those things which are necessary to prevent hunger, suffering, and, perhaps, death, is almost unbelievable. Yet the gentleman undoubtedly is but giving us the facts.

I hope to be able to point out a way in which, perhaps, the gentleman can get relief by going back to the State of Tennessee, although I may be wrong. Perhaps if this World War veteran would go back to Tennessee, his home State, and satisfactorily answer the questions put out by some local Democratic organizations, relief might be obtained.

The statement of the gentleman, coming, as it does, from that side of the House, proves conclusively that there is absolutely no certainty that when you give money to the executive department it is going to relieve the conditions which today exist. If $4,880,000,000 will not take care of a family right here in Washington, then there is no use depending upon that particular branch of the Government any longer.

This is a case right under their nose. It is right on their own doorstep. It is right in their own home. When this condition is pointed out to them, they ought to be able to take care of it. There should be coordination all through the departments, and the one purpose should be to serve our country in every possible way.

Mr. Speaker, if this Government of ours is to continue to be a government by and for the people, to fulfill its mission on this earth, then the various departments must be kept within their respective spheres, each separate and independent of the other, and each must retain to itself the function which the Government has given it.

I realize that criticism is of no account unless we offer some remedy or suggestion that will be helpful. This is true, however, and I could not help thinking of it while the gentleman was talking. Here is one situation, a very personal and acute one, so far as this father, this mother, and these children are concerned, that you cannot lay to the Hoover administration, can you? This is one little thing you cannot charge to it. Thank God for that, anyway. [Laughter.]

While no department—legislative, executive, or judicial—can safely be permitted to exercise the powers delegated by the people to the other, all must work for the common good, the welfare of all. There must be coordination of all activities of all departments and, over and above everything else, there must reign the spirit, the purpose, unalterable and all absorbing, to do those things, and those things only, which will permit this Government of ours to continue in its onward and its upward course, encouraging by its example the people of all the world to seek and attain the fullest measure of liberty, prosperity, and happiness.

Not only must our Government be efficient, but its purpose must be righteous and its acts must follow its statements of principle.

Criticism, when truthful, is the safeguard of a democratic government. When constructive, it points the way to advancement. When untruthful, when it arouses merely class hatred and prejudice, its only ultimate end is discord, revolution, or anarchy.

During the last 2 years of the Hoover administration the brilliant, the vindictive, and the resourceful gutter-scraping, mud-slinging publicity man of the Democratic organization inaugurated and successfully carried out at enormous expense and without regard to truth or common decency, a campaign to "smear Hoover."

Smear Hoover? You did a dandy job of it and you elected a man on a platform which promised to wipe out all our trials and tribulations and all our suffering and to do away with this depression. The unemployment is still with us.

During the same and a subsequent period that outspoken exemplar of dirty, nasty, practical politics, with a masterful demonstration of what has come to be known as the most reprehensible of Tammany tactics, adopting the role of a saint, built up and pictured the Democratic candidate as the only exponent of the rights, as the champion, of the so-called common man.

And what is the result, with this champion of the common man right on the scene, with more than $4,000,000,000 to spend? Here in Washington, with all of this money, after these 3 long years of effort, we have, by the statement of a Democrat whose word is unquestioned, whose information is undoubtedly accurate, a family suffering and starving, with a mother about to give birth to a child, and that without the necessary medical care.

Here in Washington we are told by a Member on the Democratic side, this situation exists, and it exists not because it is unknown, for the gentleman says he has appealed for aid, but apparently it exists because of red tape or indifference, and somewhere in the city Harry Hopkins sits and smiles and smiles and authorizes the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars for music, art, and amusement, while down at 311 D Street NW., in the city of Washington, if the gentleman is accurate, a mother and children are suffering. Did Hopkins ever hear that charity begins at home?

Ah! if you had brought in someone who really had humanity in his heart, instead of "Big" Jim Farley, to look after the political end of it, to build up a political machine, had you brought in someone to distribute relief we would never have the situation with which we are confronted today, and thankful I am that the story comes from a Democrat and not from a Republican, because it is said by this administration that all Republicans are liars.

The Republican Party and its candidate were pictured as the tools of Wall Street, the servants of entrenched greed, the champions of special privilege. The rank and file of the Republican Party was charged with having neither honesty of purpose nor patriotism. By campaign speeches over radio, in print, and by picture the people were led to believe that the average Republican was selfish, heartless, unsympathetic, uncharitable, greedy, avaricious, politically dishonest, and corrupt; that all of the virtue and all of the honesty, all of the kindness, all of the sympathy, all of the charity, all of the desire to better humanity was possessed by the members of the Democratic Party, and that all of these virtues were personified in its candidate for the Presidency. He, and he alone, was supposed to be interested in the welfare of our people, in the perpetuity of our Government. All others of opposite political faith, all those who failed to bend the knee, were outcasts and political degenerates.

This doctrine he and his supporters preached without ceasing throughout the days, the weeks, and the months, and the people were told, until some actually came to believe, that the Democratic candidate, and he alone, could save this country of ours from revolution. No more egotistical, absurd, and vicious doctrine was ever preached except in those countries where dictators have used it to establish themselves in power.

Up and down and across this land of ours Democratic orators and the President himself went far and wide, telling all that he stood upon the Democratic platform, that corruption, waste and extravagance, and false theories of government would go were he elected. No campaign with a higher announced purpose was ever inaugurated or carried to a successful conclusion. No greater fraud was ever perpetrated upon a people, for, from the day when it was swept into power by the people's childlike faith in and reliance upon its oft-repeated promises of lofty purposes and high idealism down to the present moment no government within the memory of living man has ever been so false to its promises, so betrayed a trusting people, as has the Democratic Party.

This Government was to be rescued from the clutch of Wall Street and the international banker. Special privilege was to be ended. No longer were the money changers to sit in the legislative halls or the executive offices at Washington. In short, the "money changers" were to be driven out of the temple. A noble purpose, high words of promise, but absolutely and completely false.

If such—and let us be charitable—was ever the purpose, the first grasp of hands upon the reins of power saw its abandonment. Businessmen, merchants, factory owners, industrialists of every nature, those who made this country what it is, have been banished from the council table.

Wall Street, the international bankers, the idle rich were to be thrown into outer darkness, but we notice they are still holding forth at the same old place of business, and, in addition, other high priests of greed, of selfishness, of special privilege have been added, and they have come from the countryside, from the Southland, where votes might be harvested to continue this administration in power.

If the Wall Street bankers have been denied special privileges—which they have not, as witness the speculators in silver under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934—then to their number have been added others to receive the special favors of Government.

Under the guise of aiding agriculture, but for the real purpose of purchasing the farm vote, processing taxes were levied. They were collected from the consumer, from the eater of meat and the wearer of clothing, from the underprivileged and the undernourished. The pennies, the nickels, the dimes all flowed into the coffers of this Government of ours, all, we are told, for the purpose of aiding the farmer.

True, one class did benefit at the expense of another, but who were the real, the chief recipients? Who actually received these pennies, nickels, and dimes collected from the poor, who could least afford to pay them?

The junior Senator from Michigan said day before yesterday over in the Senate Chamber, that he knew of one instance where more than $219,000 of this money in 2 years went to pay one beneficiary for not raising 14,587 hogs on 445 acres of land, $15 a hog for 14,587 of them. And he cited another instance where $168,000 was paid for not planting 7,000 acres to cotton. And again where, in 2 years, another farmer—"agriculturist" would be the more proper word—was paid $78,638.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not now; no. I am not talking about the tariff. I am talking about how you transferred control and the places to which the money was supposed to go to the South, and, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman enlighten the House by saying what—

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman from Ohio is questioning the gentleman when he has refused to yield.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman addressed his remarks—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago, addressing the Chair, that I would not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield, and the gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Seventy-eight thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars to another man.

Now, a few dollars of that $219,000 or a few dollars of that $168,000 might, I may say to my friend from Mississippi, have been taken down here to the outskirts of Washington and might have been used to relieve the condition there. That is what is called practical applied charity. The President said you must judge men by the way they act rather than by what they say. What he was referring to was the old passage, "By their fruits ye shall know them." That is what he was thinking about, I guess, but it was not followed out.

The wickedness, the viciousness, the utter corruptness of this kind of a program is demonstrated when you on the majority side refuse to permit the people to know who those who receive these large benefit payments are; when you smother, as you did, the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], when he sought to incorporate in the last agricultural bill the provision that no more than $2,000 should be paid to any one man. And when we ask the Department of Agriculture to tell us who it is that is receiving more than $10,000 per year by virtue of his payments, that information is denied to the Congress.

That the dirty work exists is shown conclusively by the fact that the Department of Agriculture refuses to permit the taxpayers to know who it is that receives the money paid in by the taxpayers. What excuse can there be for denying to a man who contributes to the support of the Government the knowledge as to where and how and in what amount his money is spent? Absolutely none, except as that expenditure be illegal or for a corrupt purpose.

Flying the flag of humanity, preaching the doctrine of charity and of helpfulness, of kindness, of justice and equality, this administration's army of officeholders, marching under the black flag of piracy, has robbed one group of taxpayers to seduce another.

Under illegal laws, which were declared to be without validity by the Supreme Court, Government officials, by threat and by use of the Federal name, by virtue of their position as Federal officers, have compelled citizens who lacked the ability to defend themselves to pay unlawful and unjust taxes. Millions—yes; literally millions—of dollars have been collected illegally by the use of the threat that if those taxes were not paid citizens would be thrown into jail or forced to stand trial beyond the jurisdiction of their home courts. This is not idle talk. Not a man in this House but knows that such was the practice under the Triple A and under the N. R. A.

This is the only administration in the history of our country which by the use of brute force and of threat of illegal imprisonment has ever held up and gone through the pockets of the taxpayer, and this charge cannot be—and even is not—denied.

Under the guise of patriotism and Christianity, under the pretense of relieving our people from the conditions brought on by a depression, which the Democratic administration charges to the preceding Republican administration, during the latter months of which the majority in this House refused to lend its constructive aid, this administration has demanded that the Congress abdicate its functions and turn over to the President unheard of sums of money to be used at his discretion, and—to our shame and disgrace be it said—that, forsaking its constitutional duty to make appropriations and to direct the expenditures of the public funds, a Congress characterized by the public as a “rubber-stamp Congress” obeyed that mandate.

For what purpose was the money sought? For what purpose was it used? We know that it has been used in ever-increasing amounts, not for the purpose for which it was given—to relieve suffering and distress—but to build up a political machine, the sole purpose of which is to continue in office and increase in power those who ask for and administer the appropriation.

We all recall how, under this promise of prosperity, under this banner whereon was painted “the more abundant life”, and greater privileges to everyone, the promise of a pot of gold at the rainbow’s end, the campaign was carried on and won; and what happened? Only more unemployment, an ever-increasing public debt. In the history of our country did there ever before exist a time when the people were forced by Government agents to give up money under laws that were void, by way of taxes, as the officials of the N. R. A. and of the Triple A went out in all our districts and made the farmers and the processors pay those taxes, which they had no right to collect.

Then what did they do with them? Here is the sad, sad thing about it. Here is the wicked thing, here is the vicious thing, and here is the thing that this administration never can get away from. We all supposed this money was to be used for relief. The money was taken from one group of taxpayers for what purpose? What right has this Government of ours to take your money or take anyone’s money to give to someone else? Only one right, and that is because the one who is receiving the money needs it or is suffering and because it is necessary. The law of necessity. Is not that right? We all agree that when that condition exists and when it is necessary to prevent suffering, then the taxpayer, whoever he may be and however little he may have, should contribute his portion for the purpose of relieving distress. To that doctrine we all subscribe. But this $4,000,000,000 and these other sums were given, contrary to our theory of government, to the President, instead of the disbursement thereof being directed by Congress. Well, let that pass. Presumably, he intended to use it for the purpose for which it was appropriated.

The charge that the pockets of the taxpayers are being picked and the money used for political purposes is a serious one and should never be made could it not be shown beyond reasonable doubt to be true. Unfortunately it is all too true, and the proof comes, not from some irresponsible, obscure official, for whose actions the President is not responsible. On the contrary, it comes from a United States Democratic Senator; it comes from the administration’s right-hand spender; the man entrusted by the President with the expenditures of a large portion of this sum; the man against whom the President has been warned time and time again, furnishes the evidence. It comes from all quarters, from all classes of people.

Let us go back a moment. Four billion eight hundred and eighty million dollars were appropriated. For what purpose? To relieve suffering, to keep people from starving, from being cold, to save homes, to rescue businesses, to lead us on the way to prosperity, to give us the “more abundant life”, whatever that may mean. That was the purpose.

Did anyone in this House think for one moment that money was being taken from one taxpayer or one group of taxpayers so that it might be given to another group of citizens, citizens otherwise without funds, citizens otherwise in need, so that that group, the needy, the suffering, might contribute a part of the tax money of the first group to a political machine?

In a news release dated March 18 and headed “Hopkins Orders Posters Banning Political Contributions” we find this paragraph referring to relief workers:

The question of whether or not to contribute to any political party is a matter entirely for the voluntary decision of said employee.

Here is an acknowledgment of Harry Hopkins that the money paid by the taxpayer for the relief of a sufferer, of one who is dependent, paid to one who needs Government aid, instead of being used for the purchase of food or clothing by the man so receiving it, may be used as a contribution to a political organization. Here is the evidence, conclusive and inescapable, that relief funds may be used to perpetuate men in office—an unthinkable proposition.

Why, oh why, should one taxpayer be forced to contribute so that another, not a taxpayer but a voter, may give a part of that money so contributed to the party in power or to any other party?

Here is music. The jingle of the taxpayers’ coin, the workers’ earnings, as the Government official takes it from him, drops it into the Government sack, then passes it out in the form of a dole or payment for “made work”, so that the public official may, and does, receive back a portion of that fund for his own interest—a triangle never completed, one where the money does not go ‘round and ‘round, but stops in the pocket of the crooked politician.

Is there anything more vicious, anything more unfair to collect from one group of taxpayers money to buy bread, fuel, and shelter and give it to another group to contribute to campaign funds? Oh, how vicious.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Briefly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman remember that instead of giving the employees the opportunity to make voluntary contributions in a former administration there was a compulsory system requiring postmasters all over the country to contribute to the campaign? [Applause.] The gentleman better acquaint himself with the history of his own party before he criticizes ours.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know the history of the Republican Party in the State of Michigan and no such course was ever followed there while the Republicans were in power. I am not familiar with the history of the Democratic Party in the South and know nothing about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I have answered it.

I will answer the gentleman further. Does it make any difference if a party has been guilty of an offense in the past, is there any sense in your continuing it? You talk about the offenses of the Republican Party, and here you are deeper and further in the mud than it ever was.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Where is the gentleman’s predecessor?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, for selling post offices he is in the penitentiary, sent there by a Federal court.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, the gentleman’s predecessor in Congress, a Democrat, is now serving time because he compelled Democratic postmasters to contribute to his campaign fund if they got the appointment. Is not that true?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, that is neither here nor there. Suppose he is there.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I want to tell you something about the Democratic organization, not in Texas.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I decline to yield until I have read something else.

The utter hypocrisy of this administration is demonstrated by its actions. Long, long years ago it was written, “By their fruits ye shall know them”; and more recently the President said that men’s motives were to be judged not by what they said but by what they did.

In the last paragraph of Mr. Hopkins’ letter, over his signature, it is said:

No person shall be employed or discharged by the Works Progress Administration on the ground of his support or nonsupport of any candidate of any political organization.

That statement is for public consumption. Those are words. The acts are very different. The acts we get from the political henchmen of "Big" Jim Farley. True, the President said that politics was to be divorced from government. What he meant was not that an absolute divorce was to be granted. What he should have said, and what he evidently intended, was that "Big" Jim Farley, the Democratic Tammany politician, should have separate maintenance, but not from bed and board; that he should continue as Postmaster General, with all of the authority and power that goes with that office, but that, as a matter of fact, his chief duty should be to perpetuate the Democratic administration in power while acting as its national committee chairman.

Words and acts! Here is the example which has been followed by the practical workers all down the line. Many have had letters from constituents seeking welfare relief, who have told us that in order to get that relief they must announce their allegiance to the Democratic Party. These letters came from individuals, and, while they were many in number and while we protested, they were only hearsay evidence of what was being done.

Time, however, has given us the direct proof. Just recently two local carpenters, working in the little village of Decatur, in Van Buren County, Mich., were discharged from a public job after it was learned that the county clerk's office showed that they had committed the crime of voting the Republican ticket in a primary election.

Still more recently a Decatur, Van Buren County, Mich., truck driver, applying for temporary work with a road-repairing gang, was handed a blank to be filled. This blank was headed "Application for endorsement by Van Buren County Democratic committee", and contained 52 questions. Among them were the following:

Did you vote in the primary of September 1934? ----- Democratic ----- Republican -----
Have you ever run for elective office? ----- On what ticket? -----
Ever held a political appointive position? ----- By whom appointed? -----
Did you vote in election of November 1934? -----
Have you contributed to any Democratic organization in county? -----
To whom? ----- How much since August 1, 1932? -----

And this is not an isolated instance. Beyond question, it is the common practice of the present Democratic machine.

I hold in my hand an application, form no. 100, received from Kalamazoo County yesterday. It is headed "Application for endorsement by Kalamazoo County Democratic Committee." This form is handed to those seeking not only political jobs but, in this particular instance, the blank was given to a man who was seeking relief work, and he was asked:

Are you a member of any Democratic organization or club? ----- Where? ----- Did you vote in the election of November 1934? -----
Have you contributed to any Democratic organization in Kalamazoo County? ----- To whom? ----- How much since August 1, 1932? -----
Are you now occupying the position for which you seek endorsement of the Kalamazoo County Democratic committee? -----

We appropriated $4,880,000,000 for relief, and to get a part of it, to get an opportunity to work, men are asked to declare whether they voted the Democratic or the Republican ticket, and how much, if anything, they have contributed to the Democratic organization.

This application is one that came in from the Third District of Michigan from Kalamazoo County. It is not put out by a Republican organization. It is addressed to the Kalamazoo County Democratic committee.

Why do they want to know whether this truck driver voted at a primary election? Because at a primary election he must ask either for a Democratic or a Republican, or some other party ballot, so by looking at the registration list they can ascertain his politics.

Why do they want to know of what Democratic organization, if any, he was a member? Why do they ask, "Have you contributed to any Democratic organization?" and if he had, "How much since August 1, 1932?" Does his membership in a Democratic organization or the amount of his contribution assist in determining whether he is a competent truck driver, or whether he needed the job? Is it possible that if he voted a Republican ticket he would be less capable of operating his truck, of filling his motor with oil, his tank with gasoline? Lubricating oil, by the way, seems to be the thing they are after; translated it means campaign funds.

You tax the people, all the people, Republicans as well as Democrats, for the purpose, as announced by this administration, of relieving suffering. Then when the man who, under the terms of the law, is entitled to aid goes to receive his share of that aid he cannot get it unless it appears that he is a good Democrat or will support the Democratic Party.

Can anyone in this House conceive of a more corrupt, of a more vicious, of a dirtier, more unprincipled manner of purchasing votes, of undermining the Government than this? If he can, then he must be in direct communication with the devil himself.

Do not misunderstand me. To my mind it is not conceivable that any Member of this House would be guilty of a practice like this, or that any Member of this House is responsible for this practice. In my judgment, it is the brain child of "Big" Jim Farley and others who lack the sense of political decency and common honesty.

One of the local papers yesterday stated that the President's publicity man had intimated rather broadly that powers from on high had advised the President of the coming flood danger and that he had made preparation to meet it. And so again the misery of the people was used to give publicity to a Presidential candidate.

Yet Republicans, when they oppose these appropriations, are charged with a lack of humanity, with being unsympathetic, with being willing to let people starve, go hungry and cold, lose their homes and their property, because we are not willing to vote unlimited funds into the hands of men who administer them as these funds have been shown to be administered.

I am complaining now, not of waste, not of extravagance, but of corruption, the sole purpose of which is to undermine our form of government.

Never will I vote to give men the money of the people of the Fourth Congressional District, to put funds into the custody of men like Harry Hopkins, when I know that a part of it can only reach those on relief if they agree to support the Democratic organization.

Republicans would be lacking, not in charity nor in sympathy nor in the finer feelings of humanity, but in good sense should they again vote to supply the Democratic Party treasury with campaign funds, as apparently this Congress did when it voted the $4,880,000,000 to the President last year.

Mr. Speaker, the President has sent down a bill for relief; and when that comes up, in spite of the fact that he has several billion dollars—one or two; I do not know how much—if any Republican on this side refuses to give him more money, he will be charged with a lack of charity, with a lack of kindness, with being greedy, with being cruel, and with being willing to let people starve and freeze and suffer from every conceivable, imaginary thing that can afflict a human being. Just because we refuse to vote another billion or two so that it can be thrown into a canal in Florida—twelve million of it—dump it on the coast of Maine in the Passamaquoddy Dam, neither of which projects is of any practical value; waste it in thousands, hundreds of thousands—yes; in millions—of dollars; waste it in every conceivable way—just so that it brings a harvest of votes—if we refuse that, we will be charged as obstructionists. Use it in pretended relief work, and get a part of that back—no one knows how much—by way of contribution from relief workers, to be used for campaign purposes.

Oh, be fair; be a little charitable with us. Treat us just half-way decent, somewhat as you would like to be treated, and let it go at that, and we will be with you on all legitimate matters.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; my time has expired. [Applause.]

EMERGENCY RELIEF, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 543, making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 543

Resolved, etc., That to provide an addition amount for the purpose of affording relief to residents of the District of Columbia who are unemployed or otherwise in distress because of the existing emergency, to be expended by the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia by employment and direct relief, in the discretion of the Board of Commissioners and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board and without regard to the provisions of any other law, $350,000, to remain available until June 30, 1936, and to be payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is an item of $350,000, payable out of the District revenues to carry the relief load along from now until the 1st of July?

Mr. BUCHANAN. To partially carry it along.

Mr. TABER. A deficiency item, entirely out of the District revenue?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Entirely so.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Would it be possible to take care of that needy case that was spoken of by our colleague from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN] a few moments ago, if the $350,000 is appropriated? The gentleman portrayed a picture that ought to touch the heart of every Member of Congress, and our colleague says that at 311 D Street is a family that needs every consideration. Might that be taken care of by this fund?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think it is possible to take care of it out of this fund, but I do not think the gentleman need be uneasy about it. That case is going to be taken care of.

Mr. RICH. It would be fine if we did it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was passed.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 461.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 461

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3424, a bill to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, of the 1 hour time allotted me, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], to be by him yielded as he sees fit.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 1, line 6, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I might say that some question has just arisen as to the possibility of a point of order being made on page 2, to what might be a reappropriation. In order to save time I have offered this amendment, which is very often included in a rule.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not also a question of a point of order whether this bill is rightfully on the calendar of the House? Does this amendment which the gentleman has offered preclude any point of order against that?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I believe it does.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know that I will make it, but I think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I know what the distinguished minority leader is referring to. The Rules Committee went into that situation and came to the conclusion the bill was properly on the calendar of the House, or we would not have granted the rule.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman will admit it is questionable, in any event?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not as to the bill or the report on the bill. The question arose as to the supplemental report, which does not go to the status of the bill in the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill, consideration of which the pending rule is to make in order, is to extend the life of the Electric Home and Farm Authority until February 1, 1937.

This corporation was created by virtue of an Executive order made under authority contained in the National Industrial Recovery Act. The life of the corporation will expire April 1. That creates an emergency, which is responsible for the measure coming here in this manner at this time.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] introduced the House bill during the last session, at the request of the President. That bill was in the latter days of the session reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency but not acted upon. The Senate has recently adopted the bill for which this rule is granted, which is identical with the McReynolds bill.

The Electric Home and Farm Authority is purely a finance company, a credit, not a selling institution. It provides a discount market for electrical appliance installment contracts for dealers, utility companies, and municipal power and light departments. It does not, as some have understood, sell the appliances. The corporation has at no time, nor does it expect, as far as we understand from the advice given us by those in charge, to enter the field of distribution. The operations of the corporation require no appropriation and will be no drain whatever upon the Treasury. It is under the conservative and experienced control of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, eight trustees furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and one by the Rural Electrification Administration.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see from examining the report of the hearings published by the committee anything to carry out the statement just made by the gentleman that there is no chance for a loss, or no chance of it being any cost to the United States Treasury. In the statement for the month of February, if any allowance whatever was made for reserves, it had been running at a loss. There was only $201 profit in that month, without reserves; and out of $9,000 total income, $6,000 was a matter of salaries.

Mr. COX. The primary purpose of the corporation is not profit, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Looking over the statement and following it through, my honest judgment is that there is a big loss in this company at the present time.

Mr. COX. The new corporation, organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, has not suffered a penny of loss.

Mr. SNELL. Right on this question, if the gentleman will yield further—

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Why was the capital stock reduced from $1,000,000 to $850,000?

Mr. COX. I want to be very frank with the House. This corporation at the outset was largely within the control of Mr. Lillienthal, of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and tremendous expenditures were made in the way of promotional activities or in carrying on promotional work. Of the total expenditures made by that agent of the Government in charge of the Tennessee Valley Authority $150,000 was charged to this corporation. Under the reorganization, under the new corporation, this $150,000 has practically been earned, and at the present time the corporation would liquidate $964,000.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, the corporation is behind today, is it not?

Mr. COX. It approaches very closely the original sum of $1,000,000 which was turned over to it.

Mr. SNELL. From the gentleman's own statement, then, to the present time the corporation is at least $40,000 behind. Am I not correct?

Mr. COX. The corporation has not suffered a penny of loss on any of its operations; not one penny.

Mr. SNELL. That was not the question I asked, if the gentleman cares to answer it. I said that according to the gentleman's own statement, according to the figures he has just given, this corporation is at least $40,000 behind. I do not know where the money went.

Mr. COX. I explained to the gentleman that at the outset those in charge were rather extravagant in spending money for promotional work.

Mr. SNELL. Why was the capital stock of the company reduced when it was reorganized in the District of Columbia?

Mr. COX. Because that was the money it had at its disposal, and it recapitalized to the extent of the total amount.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact it was recapitalized at $850,000 because $150,000 had been lost?

Mr. COX. The $150,000 was not lost.

Mr. SNELL. We will say it was spent.

Mr. COX. The $150,000 was spent.

Mr. SNELL. I will accept the gentleman's interpretation. As a matter of fact, then, this corporation up to date has not paid its expenses.

Mr. COX. The history of the new corporation is that, so far as its earnings are concerned, although incorporated with a capital stock of $850,000, it will liquidate at $964,000, showing a very satisfactory earning.

Mr. SNELL. I did not say "earned"; I referred to the whole proposition.

Mr. COX. This is a new corporation; it is not the corporation originally set up; the original corporation transferred all its assets to the new corporation incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNELL. It is to do the same kind of work, is it not?

Mr. COX. Yes; and at the present time it has a very satisfactory reserve. It has made a very remarkable record in the operations it has carried on.

Mr. SNELL. That is based on all its contracts for toasters, and so on, and so forth, being good at face value.

Mr. COX. I am very glad, of course, to yield to the gentleman in the effort to answer any questions he may propound; but my time is limited, and I want to use just a bit of it in a discussion of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has been generous. I thank him.

Mr. COX. There is nothing about this matter that I am interested in concealing. As a matter of fact, I have sought to be absolutely frank and give a true account of the $150,000 representing the difference in the capitalization in the original corporation and the present corporation.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will suffer me, please, to discuss just to a brief extent the bill and the corporation.

Mr. Speaker, the corporation is earning its operating expenses and has, as I have stated, established very satisfactory reserves. Its current operations are so favorable that it has not utilized its line of credit with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and does not owe this Corporation a dime. It is able to borrow money from the commercial banks at the rate for prime commercial paper. At the present time the corporation is getting its money at three-fourths of 1 percent.

There is an actual need for the type of service this corporation is rendering. It is making available this type of credit to people in areas where no such means of obtaining credit have heretofore existed. It originally operated in Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and, I believe, Mississippi; but the new corporation has contracts with utility people, I believe the hearings disclose, in 28 States and contemplate going into all States where like credit facilities are not available or existing facilities are not satisfactory.

Let me now bring to your attention what I think is the most important service the corporation has rendered.

As I previously stated, it has a sufficient income to enable it to meet all current expenses and to provide a reserve. It has not lost a dime. It has not been compelled to repossess a single appliance. It has not had a single lawsuit or even a threat of litigation. As satisfactory and as important as all this has been, the most important service it has rendered has been its influence upon interest charges heretofore maintained by credit institutions.

Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of common knowledge to everyone that interest charges in connection with installment transactions have previously been criminally high. But this corporation has through its activities been able to bring about a readjustment of interest charges on practically all similar transactions that result in savings to the extent of millions of dollars to the people who buy on the installment plan. For illustration, let me give you in figures the cost of credit of this type as charged by the corporation and that heretofore charged by similar private agencies.

On a $50 credit for a term of 6 months the total charge of this corporation is $3.22; whereas the General Motors Acceptance Corporation had a fixed charge of $8, the General Security Co. a charge of $7.12, and the Commercial Credit Co. a charge of $8.26. On a short-term transaction the charge of this corporation is all the way from 33 1/3 percent to 50 percent of the charge made by private financing companies.

As I said, the setting up of this corporation was not intended for profit. It is simply set up for the purpose of extending this service and making available to a class of people not heretofore having the privilege or the source of credit which would enable them to buy facilities of this character. This corporation has done fine work, not in the profit it makes, because the Government is not interested in profit. It has reduced interest charges heretofore maintained by all finance companies, and this applies not only to Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, but to the New England States and every section of the country where people, poor people as a rule, have been imposed upon by the finance companies, if they were to enjoy these comforts and facilities and at the same time compelled to buy on time. Everyone knows how terrible they have been imposed upon by the finance companies in the way of exorbitant interest charges.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. This corporation has done hardly any business. Why does the gentleman say it has caused interest rates to go down? Why not give credit to the Housing Corporation, which has brought credit rates down, not this corporation?

Mr. COX. The influence of the Housing Corporation does not approach that of this particular corporation in negotiating with these finance companies in the interest of decent interest rates. I want to say to the gentleman that of all the agencies set up by the Government I believe, so far as the poor people are concerned, this one agency has done as much as any other.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, some general statements should be made as to how difficult it is to get rid of one of these new activities which are being from time to time set up by this present Government. A remarkable example came up here a day or two ago in the matter of C. C. C. camps. When the President himself tried to reduce them the Congress would not allow him to do it. A Democratic caucus was insisted upon and the President capitulated. Now we have this set-up which they wish to continue for still another year. It is attractive. They want to love it a little longer. It is very much like the man who wanted to say good-bye to his wife who was going away on a certain train. He asked the porter if he had time enough, and the porter simply said, "How long have you been married?" [Laughter.]

With reference to the C. C. C. camps, and speaking on behalf of New England, in my own congressional district even, the directors of the chamber of commerce in my county voted to allow two of these C. C. C. camps go without any remonstrance whatever. We were glad to help the administration reduce the expenses in connection with these set-ups for relief purposes.

This E. H. F. A. was an organization set up by the use of a part of the $3,300,000,000, and the Congress had nothing to say about it.

Mr. Speaker, this is simply an offshoot of that remarkable T. V. A. experiment, of which Norman Thomas said, "It is the only perfect socialistic experiment I know about." The question is, How long should we support private purchases on the installment plan by the use of the public credit? We knew little about the second Executive order covering up the $150,000,000 which was lost in the formation of the new corporation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield? There was no Executive order covering up anything.

Mr. GIFFORD. All right. The President set up this Delaware corporation. Finally another was set up here in Washington as a different corporation. As the gentleman stated, its capital was reduced because they only had $850,000 anyhow, $150,000 having been used up.

Mr. COX. The gentleman means $150,000, I am sure.

Mr. GIFFORD. I thank the gentleman. We get so used to talking about millions and billions of dollars that I cannot get down to these low figures.

If you are boastful of the remarkable results of this thing, may I say that anyway you have only spent a million and a half. You could not have brought about a very wonderful condition with the expenditure of that amount of money. You will try to make it appear today that the activities of the corporation will be greatly broadened. Today, however, you only have 20 contracts in Illinois and two in Ohio. All the rest of the 8,000 contracts are within that little T. V. A. circle. We are told indirectly that you will not help New England unless you can come in there and force the power companies to come down in their rates to suit you. They will have to do that before you will do business with them. Then you are going to say to our dealers, as you did to these other dealers: "Cut out these frills on refrigerators. Do not charge $300. Charge only $150. Bring it down to that figure and we will finance you." The statement is made that this corporation has made $97,000. Well, deferred earnings are queer profits to me. They have the contracts, but let us see how this thing works out.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. On page 18 of the report of the committee it is stated that on the 1st of July last there was a surplus of $7,132,67. The same report states that since that time they have had an operating deficit up to February 29, 1936, of $4,452,36, and when they put in their reserve for losses they have an operating deficit since July 31 of $8,521,47. That is the committee's own statement.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; he who runs may read. It is available to everybody, as is this remarkable claim of profit of $97,000 unearned.

Now, how do they do it? When the dealer finally assures these people that the refrigerators are the kind they ought to sell and within the pocketbook of the people in that vicinity, then the dealer will sell it and will take the contract to the power company. The power company collects every month, not only for the power but for the appliances sold by the dealer. The power company takes these contracts to this concern and discounts them at about 5 percent. The E. H. F. A. boasts that it is borrowing the money at 1 percent. There is the profit. Pay the salaries, and the rest is profit. Fine business for the Government, is it not? It is like a lot of other things. We hire the money at 1 percent, because the concern is backed by the Government, and then we try to put out of business other finance companies all over the United States, which, of course, have not any government back of them.

The E. H. F. A. can discount its paper at 1 percent, yet you ridicule General Motors because it has to charge 8 percent. All over this vast country of ours people who need automobiles have to go to these finance companies, and the competition of the finance companies themselves has really got the rate down as low as they can make it in all probability, but just because it is not a private or public utility, the man who wants an automobile or many other similar useful things is not to be eligible for such privileges as are given this T. V. A. class.

You cannot long fool the public. The trouble over here is that you have been trying to see eye to eye with the President of the United States so long that some of you have become cross-eyed, as someone has said. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New Jersey will talk about the entire T. V. A., concerning which he is entirely familiar. However, I have studied this set-up. We know it has probably been a good thing for you who are in this small favored area. We know what this Government socialist experiment has done for you and how pleased you are to be thus favored in these three or four States. Do not try to fool us over here by saying you are going greatly to broaden its sphere and apply it over the entire country.

Then, again, even some of you on this side of the House, while trying to go along with the administration, rather doubt the wisdom of having high-pressure salesmen go to all these people, even within the T. V. A. district, and urge them to go into debt; but this is the way this administration is trying to bring about prosperity—by getting everybody to go into debt and making debtors of them all. Especially do you seem to care but little about adding to the indebtedness of the Government itself.

Then they say, "We have not lost anything lately, and there will be no drain on the Treasury." How shrewd they now are. They do not discount this note for the dealer until they are sure they have recourse to the dealer, and the dealer has to stand a pretty strict examination before they will lend him the money. They take very few chances, but they have lent for only 3 or 4 years. However, this venture is rather new, and repossessions have occurred in only 200 cases. They have made 8,000 contracts and they have had to repossess only 200, but before the 4 years are up they may have to repossess a great many more. Also they have to rely upon the dealer, and there may be some dealers who will do a lot of business under high-pressure salesmanship and may possibly fail. They may also have to take over the repossessed property of such dealers. They may have to take over the washing machine that "has been injured by so many suds being passed through it", as one of the committee expressed it. They may suffer some real losses. However, that is not the particular point at issue—profit or loss. Should this House continue to allow the public credit to be constantly and continuously devoted to some particular section of the country?

Private industry has resettlement schemes, slum clearance, subsistence homesteads, and other things aided with Government funds to combat. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois can tie the activities of this organization up with the activities of other organizations, resulting in overlapping conditions.

Oh, how long, how long shall we continue to operate the Government for the benefit of some private organizations or some people in certain particular localities? But, anyway, do not today tell us, "Oh, it is going to spread all over the United States." We do not want it. The principle is wrong. I think you have had a long trial and that now private business ought to be permitted to come back and take over these things. Let no more speeches from this side of the House portray the marvelous prosperity which you have been painting lately as having been brought about by these alphabetical agencies.

I may remind you again that all this prosperity and all these schemes, like this E. H. F. A., are suspended from way up here [indicating] by one alphabetical support—the I O U—that and the public credit.

They are all suspended from that one support, and all that is really going to remain is thirty-six million and a half dollars of debt at the end of the fiscal year 1937.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is the gentleman opposed to this Electric Home and Farm Authority operating in his State?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I am opposed to any such thing. For instance, I read of one city in a neighboring State having had an allotment of $800,000 for slum clearance, and there is not a slum in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CREAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I will yield briefly.

Mr. CREAL. Can the gentleman suggest any remedy to bring about his suggestion?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; the Democratic platform of 1932 [laughter], the platform you had but never put into operation—I should like to try it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLER. Is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. GIFFORD. Most of it. But you have spent all of our money, and when we come into power we will not have a dollar to use for any new purposes; you have spent it all.

You have built the new Government house, and we must live in it and try to pay for it gradually by the sort of economy and balanced budgets which you promised in that platform.

Mr. MORAN rose.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MORAN. Did the gentleman favor the platform of 1932?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have said here many times, although it would seem that the gentleman could not have been present, that I am for the platform of 1932, or much of it. But you have thrown it wholly aside. It is still new, "having never been used."

Mr. MORAN. I asked if the gentleman favored the platform in 1932?

Mr. GIFFORD. I favor the most of it. I differ with a few of the principles. You said in it that you were going to abolish useless bureaus. We were in favor of that. You said you would balance the Budget, and we were in favor of that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEN). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and very few Members are present. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEN). The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-nine Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that, irrespective of how meritorious or altruistic the ends to be attained may be, we, as Members of the Congress of the United States, are particularly interested in the legality of the method and the safety of the means by which those ends are to be attained. Therefore I am not so much concerned at this time with the object and purposes of this corporation as I am with the means which have been adopted for carrying on its activities. The Electric Home and Farm Authority of the District of Columbia is a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, the successor of a private corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware by those who constituted the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is said that in sections 1, 2, and 208 of the National Recovery Act authority is vested in the President of the United States to authorize or command the incorporation of such an organization and constitute it an agency of the United States. I shall not take the time now to read those sections but shall incorporate them in my remarks so that gentlemen may refresh their memory. I venture to say that there is not a Member of this House who will say to me after having read those sections that by any rule of statutory construction he has the slightest idea that they confer upon the President of the United States the right to incorporate, under State law, corporations to carry on Federal activities.

SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of widespread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required), to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources.

ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES

SEC. 2. (a) To effectuate the policy of this title, the President is hereby authorized to establish such agencies, to accept and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, to appoint, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws, such officers and employees, and to utilize such Federal officers and employees, and, with the consent of the State, such State and local officers and employees, as he may find necessary, to prescribe their authorities, duties, responsibilities, and tenure, and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of any officers and employees so appointed.

(b) The President may delegate any of his functions and powers under this title to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint, and may establish an industrial planning and research agency to aid in carrying out his functions under this title.

(c) This title shall cease to be in effect, and any agencies established hereunder shall cease to exist at the expiration of 2 years after the date of enactment of this act, or sooner if the President shall by proclamation or the Congress shall by joint resolution declare that the emergency recognized by section 1 has ended.

SEC. 208. To provide for aiding the redistribution of the overbalance of population in industrial centers $25,000,000 is hereby made available to the President, to be used by him through such agencies as he may establish and under such regulations as he may make for making loans for and otherwise aiding in the purchase of subsistence homesteads. The moneys collected as repayment of said loans shall constitute a revolving fund to be administered as directed by the President for the purposes of this section.

I am opposed to this method of creating Government agencies. It trespasses upon the prerogatives of the Congress and has been frequently criticized by our courts.

Mr. James M. Beck sums up the situation completely in Our Wonderland of Bureaucracy:

No Government device has been as mischievous as the unnecessary expedient of incorporating some special function of the Government into a business corporation, chartered under State laws. It has dissipated responsibility and permitted employees of the United States, under the mask of a State charter, to avoid all reasonable administrative regulations and impose upon the taxpayers an intolerable burden of extravagant expenditures often increased by gross corruption.

If we need to clothe our governmental agencies in corporate form, we had better enact a general Federal act for that purpose.

This particular corporation was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia. It is said that it will expire by limitation in April. By its charter it does not expire until the 25th of August 1937.

In the Executive order of the President by which this corporation is designated as an agency of the Government there is no such limitation. It is hinted, however, that, due to some limitation under which they are operating through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, this legislation is necessary, but the testimony adduced at the hearings does not bear this out, so there is no particular hurry for this legislation.

A few days ago there came into the House a suggestion from the President of the United States that he was studying the coordination of all Government activities and asking the cooperation of Congress to that end. Would it not be better to postpone further consideration of this matter pending such study than to further complicate the situation by its enactment? This is one of those activities that ought to have very serious consideration and the very serious investigation of the President and his coordinating committee. This corporation was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia to take over and succeed the Electric Home and Farm Authority previously organized under the laws of the State of Delaware. The previously incorporated company was organized by the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

At one of their meetings they discussed the desirability of finding markets for and encouraging the greater use of electricity. At that meeting it was determined that these activities could not be undertaken without authority from Congress. At least at that time these gentlemen showed a proper conception of our system of Government. Notwithstanding this knowledge, they obtained from the President an Executive order pursuant to which they incorporated themselves under the laws of the State of Delaware to carry on this activity, and had allotted to them $1,000,000 of emergency-relief funds.

This is not the only corporation these gentlemen organized. They also incorporated the Tennessee Valley Cooperatives under the laws of the State of Tennessee, and I have reason to believe others, for which they received allotments of relief funds.

None of these corporations are required to report to Congress, and the officers are not amenable to any of the laws placing limitations upon the activities of Government officials.

No sooner was this corporation organized—the Delaware Co.—than Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, Mr. Harcourt A. Morgan, and Mr. David E. Lilienthal, directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as directors of the new company, created 22 positions, which they filled with persons of their own choice, with salaries ranging from $6,000 to $1,440, creating through this corporation without any instruction or authority from Congress a pay roll amounting to $58,900. Under the Tennessee corporation, the Tennessee Valley Cooperatives, they created nine offices with salaries ranging from $6,800 down to $1,200, an annual pay roll of $23,880. The detail of these pay rolls I here set out:

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I would rather not. Let us not be deceived about this situation. This is not a bill simply to continue the Electric Home and Farm Authority, a corporation of the District of Columbia. As a matter of fact, Congress has no power to do that. The Government of the United States, through its agents, has subjected itself to the laws of the District of Columbia, and the men who incorporated this company have all the power, all the right, and privilege they need to continue their existence by doing as they did in the first instance, by simply filing a certificate. We are told that the purpose of this corporation is merely to carry on the business of financing the sale of electrical appliances; that this is simply a matter of continuing this corporation. That is hardly so. There is much more involved. I direct your attention to the fact that this is the first time this matter has come before this body, and that a vote for this apparently simple little measure is committing the Government of the United States to engage in the installment business, to the loaning of money on notes and chattel mortgages. This is the first opportunity you have had to vote as to whether or not, first, you believe your Government should enter into that kind of activity, and, secondly, that it is proper for the Government of the United States to engage in the small-loan business under the authority delegated to it under the Constitution of the United States.

In the report on this bill the proponents of this measure have the temerity to say that this is the opening wedge; that in the future it will be the purpose of the Government to enter into the same kind of business on all kinds of chattels. That could easily be the case. The authority which these men can take upon themselves, under the powers granted when they prepared their certificate of incorporation, and created themselves, with money of the United States, a corporation under the District of Columbia would permit of it. Their powers are:

First, the name of the corporation shall be the Electric Home and Farm Authority, and the object and purpose for which it is formed is to aid in the distribution, sale, and installation of electrical apparatus, equipment, and appliances (together with plumbing and other apparatus, equipment, and appliances operated thereby or in connection therewith) and in furtherance of such purposes;

And so forth. Mr. Speaker, if this bill is enacted, you place in the hands of Government employees the operation of this corporation, incidental to their other activities, but free from many restraints which have come to be recognized as not only desirable but necessary to guide those entrusted with Government functions. Our history has taught that it is desirable there should be on the statute books laws calculated to carry on governmental affairs honestly, to the end that Government money may be handled with integrity. Every Cabinet officer and all his assistants are limited by certain laws, as well as every other Government department. It has been held that many of these laws do not apply where the Government is acting through the instrumentality of a corporation created under State law, even though the Government owns all the stock. Such a situation is an invitation to wrongdoing.

Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that this is not the only corporation that we may expect to have come before us for this sort of recognition. I have in mind a list of 25 corporations similarly organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, by Government officials. The Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, the incorporators of which were no less personages than the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, Secretary Perkins, and Mr. Kohn, is a holding company. There are 19 homestead corporations, the stock of which is held by this housing corporation, all existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Delaware.

I know of two in the State of Maine—the Fisherman's Relief Corporation and the Maine Coast Fisheries Corporation, incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine. Officials of those corporations were engaged in the emergency relief operations. I know of five in Minnesota and two in California, and I ask the privilege of enumerating these various Delaware corporations in my remarks at this point.

FEDERAL CORPORATIONS INCORPORATED IN DELAWARE

Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, incorporated October 28, 1933. Authorized capital, 3 shares, without par value. Agent, the Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building, Wilmington. Incorporators: Harold L. Ickes, Washington, D. C.; Frances Perkins, Washington, D. C.; Robert D. Kohn, Washington, D. C.

Incorporators: Harold L. Ickes, Washington, D. C.; M. L. Wilson, Washington, D. C.; Oscar L. Chapman, Washington, D. C.

Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, incorporated October 4, 1933. No authorized capital. Resident agent, Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building. Incorporators: Henry A. Wallace, Washington, D. C.; Harold L. Ickes, Washington, D. C.; Harry L. Hopkins, Washington, D. C.

Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc., incorporated January 17, 1934. Authorized capital, 10,000 shares, par value $100. Resident agent, Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building. Incorporators: Arthur E. Morgan, Knoxville, Tenn.; Harcourt A. Morgan, Knoxville, Tenn.; David E. Lillenthal, Knoxville, Tenn.

Commodity Credit Corporation, incorporated October 17, 1933. Authorized capital, 30,000 shares, par value $100. Resident agent, Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building. Incorporators: Henry A. Wallace, Washington, D. C.; Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Washington, D. C.; Oscar Johnston, Washington, D. C.

Public Works Emergency Leasing Corporation, incorporated January 3, 1934. Authorized capital, 3 shares, without par value. Resident agent, Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building. Incorporators: Harold L. Ickes, Washington, D. C.; Oscar L. Chapman, Washington, D. C.; Theodore A. Walters, Washington, D. C.

All of the above-named companies are in existence and in good standing except the Public Works Emergency Leasing Corporation, which filed surrender of corporate franchise on January 2, 1935.

Austin Homesteads, Inc., incorporated January 16, 1934.
Duluth Subsistence Homesteads, Inc., incorporated March 17, 1934.

Richton Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated December 29, 1933.

Chancellorsville Homestead Community, Inc., incorporated December 12, 1933.

Jersey Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 12, 1933.
Penderlea Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 13, 1933.

Tygart Valley Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 12, 1933.
Laurel Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated December 29, 1933.

Mahoning Garden Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 20, 1933.

Meridian Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated December 29, 1933.

McComb Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated December 29, 1933.

Tupelo Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated December 29, 1933.

Westmoreland Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 20, 1933.

Delaware Homestead Community, Inc., incorporated January 4, 1934.

Monroe County Homesteads, Inc., incorporated January 4, 1934.

Wisconsin Forest-Farm Homesteads, Inc., incorporated January 4, 1934.

Birmingham Homesteads, Inc., incorporated December 30, 1933.

Hattiesburg Homesteads of Mississippi, Inc., incorporated January 16, 1934.

Jasper Homesteads, Inc., incorporated January 16, 1934.

All of the above-named companies are in existence and good standing, with an authorized capital stock of 10 shares par value $100, and the following-named incorporators: Frank Fritts, Washington, D. C.; Philip M. Glick, Washington, D. C.; Helen McLean, Washington, D. C.

The resident agent of all of the above-named companies is Corporation Trust Co., Industrial Trust Building, Wilmington, Del.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, while apparently merely extending the existence of a corporation, establishes a Government policy. Those who are appointed under it will not account to Congress. Their accounts are not to be subject to criticism by the Appropriations Committee. There is no method provided whereby they shall report to the Congress of the United States any of their activities. So we will find ourselves in the position every year, when any one of these matters comes before the Congress, just as we are today, trying to find out what these men did with Government money; where they invested it; how many employees they have; whether or not they are under civil service, and what their losses are during the year and what their assets are.

I venture to say from what I have observed before the Committee on Military Affairs, inquiring into the affairs of the Tennessee Valley Authority that an honest and correct statement of the affairs of this Electric Home and Farm Authority in the State of Tennessee will show a wide discrepancy in disbursements made of moneys of the United States, outside of and beyond authority even under the Industrial Recovery Act.

This is an important matter, Mr. Speaker, yet it has had very limited consideration. The bill was introduced in the Senate and was reported out with practically no report. It passed the Senate with very limited debate. It comes before the House, and only with strong insistence do we get the kind of report which gives us the meager information which we have before us today. However, I read the supplemental report of the committee with some satisfaction.

I have been trying to ascertain the reason for the destruction of the Delaware corporation and the creation of the new one in the District of Columbia, and in the report I find it states that it came about because of the criticism of the Electric Home and Farm Authority created by the Tennessee Valley directorate. I do not know from whom the suggestion came, but I assume influential Government officials deemed it wise to change the corporation and put it into different hands, and it is justified in the report on the ground that it is an adjunct of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; that they had the right to incorporate it. Can a subordinate body of this Government create governmental agencies by organizing private corporations? Can the Reconstruction Finance Corporation create agencies which to them seem proper without any consideration or authority from the Congress? We might as well say that the Supreme Court of the United States can establish inferior courts and outline their jurisdiction as to adopt any such doctrine as that. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 9 minutes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the charter of this corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, as a District of Columbia corporation, would not expire until next August; but it is equally true that the corporation would cease to function as a governmental agency on April 1 of this year, unless the bill is passed. The purpose of the bill is to extend the life of the corporation as a governmental agency from April 1 for the period of 10 months, until February 1, 1937.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I cannot yield at this point. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. Speaker, my good friend the gentleman from New Jersey has spoken of the salaries of the officers of the corporation as though great salaries had been piled up and pay rolls had been padded. The truth about it is that the corporation has today only 22 employees, and the salaries paid these 22 employees are strictly in line with the salaries provided by the Classification Act for the general employees of the Government.

Under the Executive order of the President the books and accounts of the corporation are audited and checked by the Comptroller General just as are the accounts of the other departments of our Government.

One reason for changing this corporation from a Delaware corporation to a District of Columbia corporation was to put it in a better position to the end that its operations might not be localized in the Tennessee Valley. The Delaware corporation had as its directors the three directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I am sorry I cannot yield; I have no time to yield.

In order that the corporation might not be localized in its activities to the Tennessee Valley, that it might be in a better position to extend its advantages and benefits throughout the country, to all of the States, the District of Columbia corporation was organized. Eight of its trustees come from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and one from the Rural Electrification Authority. We in the Tennessee Valley have in the past received the benefits to be derived from this corporation. The benefits to follow the passage of this bill today should go in large measure to people in other sections of the country.

The corporation today is on a sound, businesslike, economical basis. It is in no way attempting to subsidize the sale or purchase of these electrical appliances, but it does provide a means whereby the consumers can purchase these electrical appliances at fair and reasonable financing rates and upon long terms of credit.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I am sorry, but I cannot yield; I simply have not the time.

Mr. Speaker, to show how sound this corporation is in its business affairs, it is today borrowing money from private banks for three-fourths of 1 percent. It is today earning its operating expenses. It has not sustained a single credit loss and it has not had to repossess a single electrical appliance. The truth is that it is not going to sustain any real losses for the reason that whenever it finances the purchase of electrical appliances the purchaser makes the contract over to the dealer. The dealer in turn assigns the contract to the corporation and also endorses the purchaser's note and goes still further and signs a contract of repurchase, agreeing that in the event there should be any default he, the dealer, will repurchase the contract. The corporation has reduced the interest rates on the purchase price of these electrical appliances on an average of from 12 percent to between 6 percent and 7 percent. It has permitted the private utilities to go into fields where private capital in the past has been unwilling to venture. It is giving to the people out on the farms, in the small townships, in the small communities, as well as in the cities, the opportunity to have the benefits and blessings of these electrical appliances which they never had before. Through the financing of this corporation the people in these places are able to get these benefits.

This is a recovery measure. It raises the standard of living of the purchasers. It provides business for the dealers in electrical appliances, and it has done much to provide the utilities, the power companies, with a power load. One of the great problems of the utilities is to build up their power load, and nothing builds up the load like the installation of electrical appliances. In 1934 the manufacturers of electrical appliances in the United States gave quotas to the different dealers throughout the country. In the State of Georgia, where the corporation was operating, the dealers obtained the extraordinary high mark of 353.4 percent of the quota assigned to them in the sale of these appliances. In Tennessee the dealers attained 234 percent. In my State of Alabama they attained 235 percent of their quota. The Tennessee Electric Power Co. last year was awarded the Edison Institute medal for showing the largest increase in business of any power company in the country. This Corporation made it possible for the people to buy the appliances that made the market for the power, and the Tennessee Electric Power Co. won the medal.

What we wish to do now is to make it possible for the Farm Bureau Federation in Ohio to begin its program to electrify the farms in that State. The Ohio Farm Bureau is today in negotiation with the Electric Home and Farm Authority, working out a plan to take these appliances and blessings of electricity to the farm people of Ohio. One hundred and thirty-six different associations, companies, or plants in 36 different States are in contact with the corporation—all looking to the benefit of millions of people in the country. The corporation and its operations are an integral and important part of the New Deal power program. The President wants this bill passed. The people want this bill passed. Let us do our part and pass it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 106, noes 30.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 260, nays 71, not voting 99, as follows:

RELIEF TO FLOOD SUFFERERS IN OHIO RESULTING FROM FLOODS IN THE OHIO VALLEY

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have this day introduced the following House joint resolution:

Resolved, etc., That there be hereby appropriated from any unallocated and unappropriated balances remaining from the appropriation made available by reason of Public Resolution No. 11 of the Seventy-fourth Congress the sum of $1,000,000 to be used to relieve suffering and remove menaces to public health and rehabilitate stricken families and business concerns in the State of Ohio resulting from the recent floods in the Ohio River Valley. Said moneys to be distributed immediately and under the direction of the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration.

The Ohio River is for about 175 miles the southern boundary of the district which I have the honor to represent. It is a majestic river. It is considered the most beautiful river in America and is better equipped to carry river traffic than probably any river in the world. The people in the Ohio Valley near this great river are perennially troubled with disastrous floods. No one not having had experience with these floods can appreciate the damage and inconvenience they cause. I am glad to report that the Army engineers have given great consideration to the question of flood prevention. Already the Miami conservancy district in Ohio has been constructed and has proven its worth many times over. The Muskingum Valley conservancy project is now in the process of construction. A few more similar improvements on the headwaters of the Ohio and on its larger tributaries will go a long way toward the prevention of these floods.

The flood of a few days ago was very destructive, especially in the northern reaches of the Ohio River. While the flood as it swept through the towns and cities of my district did not carry any imminent danger to life, still it did carry tremendous financial loss to all classes of people and a tremendous threat to the health and happiness of the people.

In the eastern part of Ohio the water moved with greater rapidity and reached a higher level than the 1913 flood and caused much more damage. I had a letter sent me by Mr. Edgar R. Cochran, of Steubenville, Ohio, who made a survey of the conditions in Jefferson, Belmont, and Columbiana Counties, with which letter he enclosed copy of an official report made by him to Dr. Carl Watson, who is Works Progress administrator for the State of Ohio. That report reads as follows:

MARCH 23, 1936.

Official report on Ohio River flood conditions from Wellsville, Columbiana County, to Powhatan, Belmont County, filed with Dr. Carl Watson, Ohio W. P. A. chief, by Edgar R. Cochran, Steubenville, representing the American Legion in Jefferson, Belmont, and Columbiana Counties.

The cities and towns covered by this report are Wellsville, Port Homer, Stratton, Empire, Toronto, Costonia, Steubenville, Mingo Junction, Brilliant, Warrenton, Martins Ferry, Bridgeport, Bellaire, and Powhatan.

In addition, there are in the total a large number of stricken homes along this route that are not in any incorporated city or town. The total number of homes that were rendered uninhabitable by the flood is conservatively estimated at 3,000.

A great many of these are mill families of foreign extraction, and the average per family runs high. The number of homeless people from Wellsville to Powhatan is not less than 15,000, and it may be substantially higher.

Saturday and Sunday we covered the entire area and inspected many of the homes. Some had been wholly submerged for 6 to 18 hours. Others were inundated over the second story. The residential areas were clogged with sludge, silt, and debris, and the dwelling-house floors were similarly affected. The personal-property loss in clothing, furniture, and foodstuffs cannot be calculated.

Local agencies, with help from outside communities, have met the immediate emergency needs of food, medicine, and shelter. The refugees are crowded into school buildings, churches, and public and private halls. The health hazard is very great, as sanitation facilities are wholly inadequate. These unfortunate people are chiefly workers without surplus resources and with small credit privileges.

The task of rehabilitating their houses, refurnishing their homes, and caring for them until they can safely reoccupy their homes is completely beyond the financial capacity of their local communities. A quarter of a million dollars made immediately available to the municipal authorities of this area would probably suffice to control the threat of pestilence, render habitable these homes, and equip them with modest quotas of necessary furniture.

The job is essentially one of local rehabilitation, and our considered judgment is that it could best be handled by the regularly constituted local authorities. If the task is not done promptly, much worse conditions will certainly eventuate.

The crisis calls for prompt action. If authority is lacking, the Congress is in session and should immediately enact emergency legislation not only for the area covered by this report but for all of the districts which have suffered in the recent floods.

This disastrous flood in its irresistible course inundated a large amount of territory in my district, beginning at Hockport and ending at Haverhill. It maintained its reputation for causing damage, destruction, inconvenience, and ill health. In the cities and towns thousands of people were forced to abandon their ground floors and move upstairs. Hundreds of businesses, large and small, were forced to move out and build against the floods approach. Now that the waters have receded in hundreds of stores and thousands of homes there is the unsightly mud and filth and debris which brings such discouragement as would challenge the fortitude of the most stalwart. These people have been heroic in the past, and they will clean up again if they can. Financial and business depression has already staggered many of them, and the damages caused by this flood will be an additional burden that many of them cannot bear. Government assistance that will help restore the homeless to their homes and to rehabilitate those whose hopes are crushed and whose personal belongings are practically destroyed would be real charity and would be money well spent. Many of the villages and municipalities in the wake of this flood are so financially depressed as to be unable to provide the necessary means to clean the streets and alleys and thereby remove the danger of an epidemic. It is my hope that the feet of those in whose hands rests public charity will run readily to the relief of these destitute, who are destitute without any fault of their own but by reason of a great, natural, superhuman calamity. Now is the time that relief is needed. Two weeks from now may be too late.

Out of this great calamity I hope there will arise such a public sentiment as will encourage the formation and completion of relief programs that will ultimately put an end to these destructive annual calamities.

THE LADY ELEANOR

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my dear friend and colleague, Representative McGROARTY, poet laureate of the State of California, is firmly entrenched in and endeared to the hearts of his people. The Nation's Capital, no less than his own State, holds him in high esteem and affectionate regard. His love and compassion for humanity are known full well throughout the length and breadth of our country.

Out of the broodings of his heart he has written his masterpiece—a precious poem—in recognition of her humane service and as a tribute to the First Lady of our land, Mrs. Franklin D. (Eleanor) Roosevelt.

This poem, The Lady Eleanor, artistically engrossed within a beautiful frame, is this day being presented to Mrs. Roosevelt at a banquet tendered in her honor at the Mayflower by the 73 Club, comprising the wives of the Senators and Representatives who entered upon their duties initially as Members of the Seventy-third Congress.

It is an honor and a privilege to include this poem in the records of this Congress:

THE LADY ELEANOR

The roads that stretch from east to west,
The high roads and all the rest,
The roads that go

Where all men know,
Where men have come and gone before—
They know the Lady Eleanor.

They hear her footsteps. And the grass
Of fields and meadows sees her pass
On tireless quests. Where rivers bend
And oceans wait and wide lands end;
The miles that wind from shore to shore—
They know the Lady Eleanor.

What seeks the Lady Eleanor
In her wide quests from shore to shore?

She seeks the faltering heart, and they
Who bear the burden of the day,
The steps that lag, the faiths that fail
In the bleak hovels of travail,
The eyes that sorrow dims with tears,
The soul that cringes in its fears,
And all who in the shadows grope
To find the vanished door of hope.

So fares she with a word of cheer
To leave in places dark and drear,
And with a smile that leaves a light
Like sunlight through the gloom of night.
Upon her quest from shore to shore
So fares the Lady Eleanor.

—John Steven McGroarty.

ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3424) to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3424, with Mr. DEMPSEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, in considering a matter of this character, I think it is well, as far as we are able to do so, to have the absolute facts before the House.

I had a little discussion earlier in the afternoon with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], when he stated there were no losses up to the present time and that, as a matter of fact, they were running at a profit and there was no chance of loss to the Federal Government.

If I can understand statements, and I have the statement that was filed with the committee, I presume by the corporation itself, right here, I maintain that this organization has lost money every single day since it started and is losing money at the present time, and I will prove it by your own statement.

This organization started out with $1,000,000 of capital. When the assets were taken over by the new organization, less than 2 years later incorporated in the District of Columbia, there was $857,000 of assets or a loss up to that time of $143,000. At the time the new corporation set up for business on the 1st of August 1935, according to the statement here in your own hearings, their assets were $857,132. From that date to February 29 the operating deficit was $4,452 and the reserve for losses was $4,060, or an operating deficit of $8,512.

Notwithstanding this statement, which comes from your own committee, gentlemen get up here on the floor and say it has been operating at a profit.

If I have made a mistake in my computation, or if anybody wants to refute these facts, I will yield to him to do so.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman is right to this extent—

Mr. SNELL. I am right as far as the actual figures are concerned.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. They are making their operating expenses today.

Mr. SNELL. The statement I gave was up to February 29, and they had not made them up to that time. Have you a later statement?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; they made them during the month of February, but there were large expenditures in the beginning amounting to nearly $150,000.

Mr. SNELL. We have gone past that date.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; if you are going to get the entire picture you have got to go back to the beginning and bring it up to date.

Mr. SNELL. I have brought it to date, and it is a loss all the way. I have your statement right here and you had assets of $857,000 on the 1st of August of last year; and according to this statement the operating deficit up to February 29, the last statement before us, was over $4,000; and when you put up your reserve for losses of $4,000 or more the actual loss is $8,060. Does anyone deny that?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. These reserves are assets.

Mr. SNELL. No; they are not; they are reserves to offset losses in their many contracts. You can see that from this statement. Reserves are in the liability column always.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It is true that they did expend $150,000 in the beginning under the Delaware corporation.

Mr. SNELL. I am talking now from the beginning—August 1935—when the new corporation took over the assets of the old one.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It is true that when they first took over the assets they did not make all expenses, but they are making them now.

Mr. SNELL. You only had $201 credit for February and did not make any allowance for reserves. You had $875,000 in contracts spread over the whole country, with no reserves, and you actually lost money.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There is no corporation in the world that can make money in the first months.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman agrees that they lost money?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I agree that we are making expenses today and a little profit.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I would say that there has been some losses in the past, but the corporation now is not losing any money. I would say also that the operation of this corporation has saved the women of America hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. SNELL. That is not an answer to the argument that I presented.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am stating the facts.

Mr. SNELL. I do not wish to yield for another speech; the gentleman has already made that speech and I made no comment. The statement that the corporation is making money is not according to the facts. Has the gentleman any statement later than February 29?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The statement of February 29 does not show a loss.

Mr. SNELL. It does show a loss. It shows that they had $201, but you make no provision or allowance for reserves, and when you make the necessary reserves for bad accounts there is a loss.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If the gentleman says that the statement shows a loss, I do not agree with him.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman is going to put in what he says they have saved the women of America, that is another thing, but from your own statement from your own committee you are losing money.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will yield to the gentleman briefly.

Mr. MAY. Just to show that this report states that the thing is a losing proposition from the beginning, I call the gentleman's attention to a few lines on page 3 of the committee report:

Private capital does not consider it profitable to do an installment lending business in such areas. Private utility companies have indicated a willingness to cooperate in the rural-electrification program by building new power lines to serve rural areas.

And so forth.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman that that cannot be done.

Mr. MAY. And they lost $165,000 the first year.

Mr. SNELL. I want now to refer to another statement made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and also by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. Both tried to give the impression to the House that it was necessary to have a new corporation in order to expand this work through other States of the Union. Is not that correct?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; but I want to say—

Mr. SNELL. Oh, is it not a fact?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If the gentleman wants me to answer that question, I shall answer it in my own way. Under the old corporation the directors of the corporation were the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and what they wanted to do was to have the members of the corporation general rather than localized in the Tennessee Valley, and one reason for setting up a new corporation was to get rid of the T. V. A. directors and set up some new directors named from the R. F. C. and the Rural Electrification Authority personnel.

Mr. SNELL. But it was not necessary to get a new corporation to get rid of those directors.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That was one reason they did it, and another is that the power under the Delaware corporation was so wide that the Comptroller General was constantly calling attention to the fact that the corporation had too much power, and that it ought to be limited to the specific purposes it is now limited to under the District incorporation.

Mr. SNELL. Let me prove to the gentleman that the statement I made is correct, and I read from the testimony. Mr. Hollister was interrogating Mr. Weaver, who is secretary and treasurer of this organization:

Did the Executive order limit your operations to these three States?

Mr. WEAVER. It did not. We considered it as a subsidiary of the T. V. A., an aid to help develop the Authority.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Was that in the Executive order?

Mr. WEAVER. No, sir.

There was no order that it should be limited to that territory anywhere.

Mr. HOLLISTER. They had full authority to operate in every State in the Union?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

So that proves from the testimony that it could operate in every State in the Union without this new organization.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. As a practical proposition, it was not efficacious or wise to have the T. V. A. directors operating throughout the country.

Mr. SNELL. But that had nothing to do with the original charter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is the distinguished gentleman from New York perturbed about the $200 deficit, or is he just opposing the legislation on principle?

Mr. SNELL. I am opposed to gentlemen making the statement on the floor that they are running at a profit when they are not, and I am opposed to any legislation that continues the Government in business, especially the pawn brokerage business. Does the gentleman understand my position now?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I would say to the gentleman that this agency is not in business in competition with any private financing company or public utility.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, yes, it is. There are thousands of financing companies throughout the United States, and to show how efficient this Corporation is, it borrows its money at three-quarters of 1 percent, lending it at 5 percent, and still loses money.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that this Authority is not in competition with any private business. This Authority is designed to develop business by cooperating with the utilities and without infringing upon their rights. It helps them and the borrower on or purchaser of appliances. This is a happy arrangement. Its purpose is to develop business in cooperation with the utilities that will assist in bringing down the interest rates and charges to the buying public. What could be more desirable?

Mr. SNELL. Now, the gentleman is making a speech, and I want to get to something else.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The gentleman is gifted in speaking, so why not answer my statement, if he can?

Mr. SNELL. Let us talk about the business before the House and not some imaginary situation. This whole question narrows down to whether you are in favor of continuing the Government in competition with private business or not. Seven-eighths of the men on the Democratic side of the House, if you talk to them confidentially and alone, will say that they are opposed to that sort of legislation. Here is the opportunity to show whether they will stand up and vote as they think. There is no question before us except whether we want to do that. That is the whole question here today; and as I told the gentleman from North Carolina, I am absolutely opposed to doing anything that continues the Federal Government in competition with private business, and that is the question here, and that is why I am opposing this legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman know of any public-utility company or manufacturers of any electrical appliances who are opposed to this program?

Mr. SNELL. I am not entering into that proposition at all, because I do not know, and I am not making statements I do not know about. I am not interested in public utilities, and I care nothing about them, so far as this is concerned. I am talking about the proposition before us, and I say that I am opposed to the Government's going into competition with private business. Is the gentleman opposed to that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In some instances I am, and in some I am not.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman cannot be for it on one day and against it on the other. The gentleman would put them in business in his country, but not in mine. It is the principle I am opposing—whether temporarily it does help your part of the country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is not in the spirit of controversy, of course.

Mr. SNELL. No. I want to get the facts out in regard to this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are just trying to develop the purposes and the spirit of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I am developing the facts, not fancy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the people who would ordinarily complain about competition agree that this is a good thing for their products and at the same time a good thing for the consumers of electricity in the homes where it is used, can the gentleman find any legitimate objection to it?

Mr. SNELL. You can always get people who want the Government to do something for them to temporarily agree to most anything, but still they are against the general principle as applied to the whole country. That is the question here today. Now, perhaps it is doing a little something for you people down there, but as a general proposition, the gentleman says himself he is opposed to it, and he ought to be opposed to it in his own country. I am opposed to it everywhere, whether it is in my country or in the gentleman's country or any other of the 48 States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand, this is an exception to the principle which the gentleman is stating, because there is not any competition.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, there is nothing to that, and you know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has again expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, the fly in the ointment this afternoon seems to be that the opposition is afraid the loan sharks of the country—the finance companies—are going to have some of their teeth pulled by this bill. I am rising in favor of this bill—S. 3424—and I hope it will pass. I am for the bill for a number of reasons, but I want to say first that one of the reasons I am particularly interested in it is that it is pulling the teeth of the loan sharks—the finance companies—that heretofore have exacted anywhere from 16 to 25 percent interest from the purchasers of electrical appliances that people use in their homes. This corporation provides a rate of about 7 percent, which is just about 18 percent less than most of these loan-shark institutions charge.

I am interested in the bill for other reasons. In the first place, the operations of this corporation were originally limited to three States. Even in those three States it had the general effect of drastically reducing financing rates not only within that area but all over the country.

Second, I wonder how many Members of this House will have the hardihood to maintain that the placing of electrical equipment in American homes does not reduce drudgery in those homes? I am wondering if they will maintain that it does not contribute to the beauty and convenience of the American home? That is what the Electric Home and Farm Authority has been doing, and that is why I am so heartily in favor of extending its term of life. We want this corporation to be able to operate in all of the 48 States instead of only in 3 States.

It is making it possible for thousands of people who otherwise could not purchase electrical equipment to have it. That has two effects. It builds up the power load on the power line, whether it is publicly owned or privately owned, and it creates a great backlog of employment in the areas where the equipment is manufactured. For that reason it is a very sound bill. If this Authority is extended to April 1, 1937, it will give the corporation an opportunity to spread its activities all over the 48 States. There are requests from 38 States asking it to come in. Why are they asking them to do it? Private enterprises? The private loan sharks are willing to go into that field if they can get 22 to 30 percent, but they are not willing to go in for 7 percent. As a result of the activities of this corporation, many of those companies have had to reduce their rates, and that is something Congress should encourage. Of course, you on the Republican side have always stood for big power companies. If you want to do a favor for the big power companies, you should vote for this bill, because it will build up their load and enable them to sell more appliances, and it will give them a market for more power.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman spoke of an average of 7 or 8 percent.

Mr. FORD of California. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. On page 4 of the report it mentions 4.66 percent interest per annum.

Mr. FORD of California. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To what does that refer?

Mr. FORD of California. That is the face of the note. There are one or two little charges that bring it up to about 7 percent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So a customer who purchases electrical equipment does not pay in excess of 7 percent?

Mr. FORD of California. Not in excess of 7 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. Ford] has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, once and for all let us conclusively settle what the authority of E. H. F. A. was under its Delaware charter. First, it had a life of 7 years. Secondly, if you will read the charter, on page 5 you will note that it was authorized to conduct its business or any part thereof in this State, in any State, the District of Columbia, the Territories and colonies of the United States, and in foreign countries. That is from the Delaware charter, and that should settle once and for all the field of operation in which E. H. F. A. could work.

The reason they worked only in the Tennessee Valley Authority area was at the instance and direction of Harcourt Morgan, Arthur Morgan, and David Lillenthal, who were the original directors of the T. V. A. That is the long and short of the matter. They were incorporated under the laws of Delaware.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not just now, please. They were incorporated under the laws of Delaware, pursuant to an Executive order. If you will examine the Delaware charter, you will find that they are not responsible to the Congress of the United States and do not have to make a report to us.

That was in January 1934. Now look at their new charter as of August 1935, and you will find they want to operate until April of 1937 in all the States of the Union, which is the right they had before, as a matter of fact, under a board of trustees carrying on precisely as they did under the Delaware charter. They were, however, incorporated for $1,000,000 under the Delaware charter, but for only $850,000 under the District of Columbia charter. What happened to the $150,000? It was charged off as promotional expenses, hence they dropped their capitalization. So much for this.

I am not opposed to the extension of electrification in the country; I am not opposed to seeing thousands and millions of families have the benefit of electric power, electric ranges, refrigerators, and such things.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves the question of the charters?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. What becomes of the Delaware corporation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The fact of the matter is the Delaware corporation is still alive. It is inactive, but its charter has not been surrendered. At the present time we have two corporations under the E. H. F. A., one known as the Electric Farm and Home Authority and the other as the Electric Farm and Home Authority, Inc.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman know what it is contemplated will be done with the Delaware corporation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have no idea. It was stated they wanted this to run until the 1st of April 1937, which would make it coterminous with the end of the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, yet they come before our committee and testify they never borrowed a dollar from the R. F. C. So how far does this argument get? But let me get to the real substance of this thing and to the reason I am opposed to the bill.

I am not interested in loan sharks, utilities, or anything else. My first objection to this bill is that the so-called board of trustees of the E. H. F. A. tell a utility whether or not it can get the benefit of this, depending on whether its rates are low enough. [Applause.] If they are not low enough they cannot get the benefit of it. Secondly, they say to the manufacturer of refrigerators, stoves, ranges, pumps, cream separators, and so forth, that their products must pass inspection. For instance, let us consider the manufacturer who produces an especially fine electric range—a beautiful range which retails for $200. They will say to him: "You have a beautiful range which retails for $200. Take off that little oven thermometer, take some of the nickel off, and put on a lot of battleship gray instead of the ivory and green trimmings and get the price down to $140 and you can do some business with us." As a matter of fact, they are using the E. H. F. A. as a kind of bludgeon, as a kind of weapon, if you please, and only those manufacturers who will submit to such treatment can get the benefit of the public's money and of the operation of a public agency. It may be fine in theory to make manufacturers build their wares down to a price instead of up to a standard, but usually you get what you pay for; and it may be that the security of cheaper appliances over a period of years will some day strike E. H. F. A. in the face. My objection goes far deeper, however; I am opposed to duplication of effort among various governmental instrumentalities all operating in the same direction. They have set up a Rural Electrification Administration, also under a temporary emergency order. What does it do? First of all it can lend the money over a period of 20 years at 4 percent for the purpose of wiring homes in the country. Then there is a Federal Housing Administration, which has authority to do a finance business on electrical appliances. Then we have our little Eva, the E. H. F. A., which, if you please, does business on a finance basis down in the Tennessee Valley.

Touching this question of duplication, I am going to read from the hearings a statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown], a distinguished and able member of the Committee on Banking and Currency:

I have tried to fight against legislation which brings about a duplication of Government activities. The committee knows I made a fight on that, particularly with regard to the examination of banks, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Federal Deposit Insurance, the Comptroller's office, and the Federal reserve bank. We have four different authorities examining banks.

We had a bill here a day or so ago in which we were asked to extend the activities of the Electric Home and Farm Authority.

Now, having in mind that organization, of which you doubtless know something—and I give that as an example to you—are there any other activities of the Government in addition to that one that are performing substantially the same functions that you are?

Perhaps I am wrong in implying that you do the same thing that the Electric Home and Farm Authority does, but it seems to me they are financing the same way that you are to a certain extent.

I would like to have you tell us what, if any, overlapping there is in the agencies of the Government with respect to financing purchases.

Mr. McDONALD. That is very interesting, because last fall we were having conversations with them. They are doing financing of electric utensils.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Stoves?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes; refrigerators and things like that; but they confined their activities to the Tennessee Valley district, I think, at that time, and they wanted to reach out and found that their rate was higher than ours; therefore, they receiving their money through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, we had some meetings with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with the object of separating the territory, if we could, or in any way stopping the conflict, because they had great difficulty in making progress against the Federal Housing Administration. Our volume of business was many times greater than theirs, and we were under way, and in addition they required some provisions which we did not.

It appears to me that there you have a definite confession of duplication of functions.

The Interstate Commerce Committee of this House has reported out a bill dealing with rural electrification, section 5 of which reads as follows:

Sec. 5. The Administrator is authorized and empowered, from the sums hereinbefore authorized, to make loans for the purpose of financing the wiring of the premises of persons in rural areas and the acquisition and installation of electrical and plumbing appliances and equipment. Such loans may be made to any of the borrowers of funds loaned under the provisions of section 4, or to any person, firm, or corporation supplying or installing the said wiring, appliances, or equipment. Such loans shall be for such terms, subject to such conditions, and so secured as reasonably to assure repayment thereof, and shall be at a rate of interest not exceeding 3 percent per annum.

They stated on this floor that the E. H. F. A. could continue doing business on the basis of a discount of 5 percent. Here is a bill which they will soon present for action which says they will finance all this for 3 percent. I am not going to vote for a bill to charge 5 percent when another bill is being sponsored, perhaps by the administration, which will make the charge 3 percent, the loan to run over a long period of time.

It seems to me that we have gotten to the point where we have to stop this duplication of activities. I am in entire sympathy with an electrification program. While as a general thing I do not like to see the Federal Government go too far in competition with private business, yet I am not insensible to the fact that there are 6,000,000 farm homes in this country out of a total of 6,800,000 which do not have the benefit of central-station power today. Only 10 percent of the farmers out in Illinois have the benefit of central-station power. I am, therefore, in sympathy with that broad program. But why do we have to have three independent set-ups in order to carry out such a program? For the purpose of financing the sale of appliances we have a Federal Housing Administration which has 3,832 people on the pay roll. Their expenses for the last 9 months were something in the neighborhood of $12,000,000. The E. H. F. A. has only 29 on the pay roll. Their total business, however, for the 26 months in which they have been operating amounts to $1,400,000, but their expenses were $216,000, or 15 percent of their gross business.

Finally, we have the Rural Electrification Administration with 242 people on the pay roll. They have done $9,000,000 worth of business since being in existence, but they have spent over $432,000. Is there any rhyme or reason, is there any sense in the kind of a set-up where we have one governmental agency which tells the farmer he can finance his plumbing through an office at 1020 Vermont Avenue, Washington, D. C., and tells the same farmer that he can finance a pressure bathroom system in his house through an office in the Tower Building, Washington, D. C., and finally that he can finance the purchase of a vacuum sweeper, cleaner, or washing machine through an office at 2000 Massachusetts Avenue in the city of Washington, D. C.?

Mr. Chairman, it is high time these agencies were coordinated. It is high time we take some of this personnel away. It is high time we were giving attention to a promotion of efficiency and an elimination of bureaucracy in the efforts on the part of the Federal Government to finance the sale and distribution of electrical appliances. If you want to do your constituents a favor you will defeat this bill and wait until the R. E. A. bill comes up for consideration, because they are going to get the money for 3 percent instead of the 4.66 percent or 5 percent provided in this measure and perform identical functions.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman answer a question? I am sure he wants to be fair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman knows the extension of clause 1 of the Federal Housing Administration Act is only for a matter of a very few months. That is the 3-percent organization the gentleman is talking about. The bill which is to come before the House extends the life of that organization until December of this year. This is a matter that goes on until 1937. So why bring that up?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman that rural electrification is going to run on for 10 years.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman was making an issue of the difference in the interest rate of these two institutions. One was created as an electrification organization and equipment was a side issue, while the Federal Housing Act is going to be for a very short time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio, if he will read section 5 of the bill (S. 3483) which was reported out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which bill deals with the sale, acquisition, and the financing of wiring, electrical equipment, fixtures, and all of that sort of thing, he will find my statement is substantiated. Why should we set up this temporary organization when it can be incorporated under the R. E. A., if they are going on with the rural electrification program, and have it all localized in one central body?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would suggest to the gentleman that, in the first place, even if the rural electrification bill passes, of which we have no assurance, although I think it will pass, the gentleman must know it will take a good many months, probably a year or two, to set up the instrumentalities and agencies for its operations under that bill. In the meantime, why deprive the people of the country of the benefits of existing law which is in nowise in competition with anybody?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from Alabama that this organization may run along some little time until a new set-up may be arranged or until some of these functions may be transferred to the Federal Housing Administration. The folks in the Tennessee Valley Authority area will not be deprived of financial services or assistance because there is in existence already a governmental agency with almost unlimited money and unlimited authority to carry on that program.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman know that the R. E. A. bill, which it is assumed will be reported by that committee, specifically abolishes the feature of the lending system to which the gentleman is objecting?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Does not the gentleman know that the bill, which has not only been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency but upon which the Rules Committee has allowed a rule, which bill extends the life of the Federal Housing Commission until December 31, expressly eliminates electrical equipment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but at the present time they have the authority to go ahead on electrical equipment until it is changed by action of the Congress.

Following this same line of thought, only this week, the suggestion came from the President that he intended to examine into the matter of coordinating governmental activities, and accordingly appointed a commission for that purpose. We might well give that commission a running start by voting this measure down and doing a little coordinating right now.

The duplication of effort is an indefensible procedure which only multiplies the number of people on the Government pay roll and adds to the expense saddled on the taxpayer. Today we have a Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which makes loans on homes and must maintain complete records and a huge collection agency; we have a Federal Housing Administration dealing with home financing and with modernization; little E. H. F. A. does with appliances; the F. H. A. also deals in appliances; the R. E. A. will soon get a long lease and a lot of money for rural electrification and appliance sales; the F. C. A. deals with loans on farms, livestock, feed, and seed; the Resettlement Administration deals with homes in satellite cities; the Suburban Resettlement Administration deals with homes in so-called subsistence homestead projects involving financing, maintenance, and even the purchase of furniture. Every one of these must maintain a staff, a system of records, a collection agency, when, as a matter of common sense, every loan pertaining to the farm, whether it be a land-bank loan, a loan to build a bathroom, wire his house, or finance an electric sweeper for the farmer's wife, could all be handled by one agency, whereas every loan or bit of financing dealing with the city dweller's home, a new roof thereon, a washing machine, or what not could be concentrated in one agency.

There seems to be no apparent desire to weed out this duplication of effort at public expense, and therefore I find it necessary to oppose the bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this Electric Home and Farm Authority is part of the administration's power program, which has done more to reduce electric light and power rates, in every State in this Union, provide cheap electricity for the American farmers, and enable the average citizen to enjoy a more liberal use of electricity, as well as the use of those electrical appliances that go to make his home more pleasant, and to lift the burdens of drudgery from the shoulders of the housewives of this country than anything else that has ever been done by any administration in the history of the Republic.

Gentlemen in the House who are opposing this measure have opposed every single movement we have made to reduce electric light and power rates or the prices of electrical appliances to the ultimate consumers, and have attempted to block our every effort to electrify the farm homes of the Nation. They are simply running true to form here today.

They have now caught hold of a live wire, one that is going to vibrate in every one of the 20 million American homes that are now using electricity and being overcharged anywhere from 50 percent to 500 percent for it. They are going to be "remembered" in those homes every time the light is turned on, and especially every time it is turned off to try to hold the light bill down.

They throw up their political hands in affected horror and say that this E. H. F. A. has lost "thousands of dollars." They give no credit for the fact that this is a new enterprise and has not had time to recover the expenses incident to its getting started, harassed as this entire program has been by litigation and obstacles of every other kind.

In the face of all this opposition, we have already reduced electric light and power rates to the American people by more than $150,000,000 a year, and the reductions have just begun. We are going to keep up the fight until we reduce rates all over the country and make it possible for the people who pay the bills to consume enough electric energy and use sufficient electrical appliances to enable them to really enjoy its benefits.

When this E. H. F. A. was created, its directors invited the large manufacturers of electrical appliances and the representatives of the power companies to meet them in a conference. At that time, people were denied the liberal use of electricity because electrical appliances were so high they could not buy them, and the electricity was so high they could not afford to use those appliances. So they called these people in conference and arranged to finance the purchase of certain appliances, if sold at reasonable prices, in areas where the power producers would agree to reduce their rates to where the people could afford to use electricity to operate those appliances.

They said to the power companies, "Your rates are too high"; and to the appliance manufacturers, "Your prices are too high; if you will reduce your prices, we will put our stamp of approval on your appliances, in every locality where the utilities will reduce their light and power rates to where the people can afford to pay them."

This was agreed to, and the E. H. F. A. began to operate, first, of course, in the Tennessee Valley area; because the rates there had already been reduced by the T. V. A. They began to operate, not at a loss, because, in the first place, the man who sold these appliances would see to it that they were not sold to irresponsible persons. He was a merchant; he was doing a legitimate business. He was responsible, and he scrutinized every sale. Then when he sold those appliances, he collected a down payment and required monthly payments on the balance until the entire account was liquidated. He passed this paper on to the Electric Home and Farm Authority and endorsed it, with recourse, and with a retain title lien on the appliances sold, as a further guarantee that these notes would be paid in full.

Thus the people who had been denied the use of electrical appliances were given an opportunity to purchase them and to use them while they were being paid for, and at the same time had their light and power rates reduced so they could afford to use them.

One of the gentlemen opposing this bill made fun of these washing machines. I should like to see him bow down over a washtub and a scrubboard, and do the family washing for a few weeks. That would convert him; it would probably make a Democrat out of him. [Laughter and applause.]

As I have pointed out before, the electricity to operate a modern washing machine for the average family of five people, at the T. V. A. rates, costs less than $1 a year. Just think of the nerve-racking, back-breaking, health-destroying, youth-killing drudgery these machines can take from the shoulders of the women, and especially the mothers, of this country.

If I have ever pioneered in any one thing in my life, it has been in my efforts to bring cheap electric energy to the American people, and especially to the American farmers. [Applause.]

If I have ever succeeded in anything during my public services, it has been in bringing to the people I represent cheap electric energy, enabling them to enjoy some of the blessings of this great electric civilization in which we live. The district which I represent is leading America in this rural electrification movement, as well as in securing cheap electricity to the people in the towns and cities.

I wish you could read the expressions of gratitude I receive from people who are enjoying these benefits, and also the pathetic appeals that come to me from people in every State in the Union, begging me to help them get cheap electricity for their homes.

This E. H. F. A. has helped to make it possible for our people to purchase electrical appliances at reasonable prices, while the T. V. A. has made it possible for us to secure electricity at reasonable rates. I saw an electric range last year sell for $57.50 that prior to this E. H. F. A. arrangement sold for $135. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] complains because, he says, we compelled the manufacturers to reduce their prices. Why should he complain because they reduced prices to where the people could afford to buy these appliances? Do you suppose that the manufacturers lost money? Why no! They made money, and they put more men to work to manufacture these articles. I dare say that the money that has been advanced through this organization has done more good and has resulted in putting more men to work in various ways than any other similar amount put out by the Government since the depression began. Besides, there are more people today using electric refrigerators, electric ranges, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, and other labor-saving appliances than have ever been known in all the history of this country.

One would think, from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, that this E. H. F. A. was confined to the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee. As a matter of fact, it applies to every State in this Union, and if the power companies which now operate in the State of Illinois, or the State of Massachusetts, or the State of Michigan, or any other State, had reduced their rates down to what they should be, and what they are going to be before we quit, your people would have been getting the benefits of this E. H. F. A. long ago. I repeat what I have said before, that we are not going to let up in this fight until we give the American people in every State of this Union electric energy at the T. V. A. rates. [Applause.]

To hear these gentlemen talk, you would think that this measure is going to help the farmers only. I wonder if that is the reason for the solid opposition of the Old Guard Republicans. As a matter of fact, it is not confined to the rural areas. It applies to the people in the towns, in the cities, in the country, and, in fact, to all the people in every State.

Do not you Members from the large cities forget that the women you represent are interested in these washing machines, electric irons, vacuum cleaners, and other labor-saving devices. They have this drudgery of washing and scrubbing to perform, in the basements of their homes, in the kitchens, or in the dingy back rooms of your crowded tenements. A great poet in a great city once said:

O men with sisters dear,
O men with mothers and wives,
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives!

Sometime ago, I placed in the RECORD lists of bills paid by urban consumers of electricity, showing the savings under the T. V. A. rates. I now desire to show the benefits of rural electrification in that area. What we are doing for the farmers in the T. V. A. area, we can do for the farmers in every section of the country. We can supply them with electricity at the T. V. A. rates, and reduce those rates as the years go by. This is a national policy, and should be carried to the people in every community in the United States.

I must confess that it has been a hard battle to get this program started in my own district. It has been a constant fight from the passage of the bill creating the T. V. A. to the present hour. I have been compelled to take the lead in that fight, and, while we still have not reached all the farmers in the territory by any means, we are on our way. We are reaching large numbers of them, and we are doing our best to reach the rest of them as quickly as possible.

My slogan is "Let's electrify every farm home in America."

I have before me a large stack of letters and messages from these rural consumers of electricity, expressing their gratitude for this service, showing the appliances used by each one, the amount of electricity consumed, and the amount of the monthly bill. I am going to give you the substance of these messages. Look them over carefully, and you will catch a glimpse of the dawning of a new day for the American farmers.

In order that you may be able to figure these bills out for yourselves, I am inserting at this point the table of rates which these farmers in the T. V. A. area are paying.

First 50 kilowatt-hours per month,	4 cents per kilowatt-hour.
Next 50 kilowatt-hours per month,	3 cents per kilowatt-hour.
Next 100 kilowatt-hours per month,	2 cents per kilowatt-hour.
Next 200 kilowatt-hours per month,	1 cent per kilowatt-hour.
Next 1,000 kilowatt-hours per month,	4 mills per kilowatt-hour.
Excess over 1,400 kilowatt-hours per month,	7½ mills per kilowatt-hour.

One cent per kilowatt-hour of this charge, up to 100 kilowatt-hours per month, goes to pay for his membership in the association, or to amortize these rural lines. At the rate they are now going, these lines will be paid out in less than 20 years. As soon as they are paid out, the extra charge of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour will be taken off.

I should point out the fact that many of these farmers keep their refrigerators turned off part of the time, and some of them all the time, during the cold weather. This accounts for the extremely low consumption of electricity indicated in some of the cases to which I shall now refer. Many of these farmers were able to purchase their appliances as a result of the assistance rendered through this Electric Home and Farm Authority, and so far as I have been able to find out, all their payments have been promptly met. There may be a few isolated exceptions, but they have not come to my attention.

This power is being purchased from the T. V. A. at the wholesale rate of about 6 mills a kilowatt-hour, less than 100 miles from the Muscle Shoals Dam. This price is really too high, and we hope to get that rate reduced as time goes on. Prior to the creation of the T. V. A., the power company was buying this power at the dam at 2 mills a kilowatt-hour, or one-third of what these rural power associations are now paying.

The Army Engineers in charge of the Muscle Shoals plant at that time proved conclusively that this power was being sold at a good profit, and their report of 1930, signed by Patrick J. Hurley, then Secretary of War, showed that this power could be generated and transmitted 100 miles and sold at a profit, for 1.993 mills a kilowatt-hour—approximately 2 mills a kilowatt-hour, or one-third of what these rural associations are now paying.

Surely these county associations cannot now be charged with receiving a governmental subsidy, nor can it be said that the T. V. A. is selling them power at a loss. Instead, the T. V. A. is selling this power at a handsome profit. If the T. V. A. could sell 80 percent of its power load at the price these associations are paying, it could amortize the entire investment in less than 20 years, and could probably do it in 10 years.

These county power associations are making sufficient profits to amortize their own investments in less than 20 years, after paying all expenses of every kind. In fact, at the rate they are going, some of them will pay out in less than 10 years. So it cannot be charged that these farmers are receiving a subsidy in any sense of the word. They are paying for what they get.

The following messages from individual farmers, and their wives, reflect the brightest rays of hope the people in our rural districts have seen for a hundred years.

MONTHLY COST TO INDIVIDUAL FARMERS—ELECTRICITY AND APPLIANCES USED

Here is a letter from Mr. W. T. Anderson, who lives 7 miles from Tupelo. He says he uses lights, an electric refrigerator, electric iron, and an electric range. During the month of February 1936 he used 173 kilowatt-hours of electricity, which cost him $4.96, including $1 paid on amortizing his line—making his electricity cost him $3.96.

I am sure that Mrs. Anderson wrote the letter giving this information, for it contains the following postscript:

We do all cooking for a family of five on our electric stove. Now a pleasure to prepare a meal—once a drudgery on the old wood stove. We fully appreciate your efforts in making T. V. A. power and rates possible for us.

Here is one from Mr. J. H. King, who lives 3 miles from Corinth. He uses lights, radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, and electric washing machine. Last month he used 23 kilowatt-hours of electricity which cost him $1, including 25 cents paid toward amortizing his line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

A letter from Mr. M. A. Reese, who lives near Tupelo, shows that he uses lights in his home and in his barn, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, vacuum cleaner, range, fans, and electric pump to provide water for his family use, and for his mules and dairy cows. Last month he used 111 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $3.72, including $1 payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $2.72.

Mrs. George W. McPherson, who lives 6 miles northeast of Tupelo, uses lights, electric range, electric pump, and radio. Last month she used 146 kilowatt-hours, which cost her $4.44 including $1 that goes to pay for her line—making her electricity cost $3.44.

Mr. M. C. Ritter, of Belden, uses lights, an electric range, electric refrigerator, and electric fans. Last month he used 214 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $5.64, including $1 to pay on his line—making his electricity cost him $4.64.

Mr. W. E. Eubanks, who lives 4½ miles west of Tupelo, uses lights, electric iron, electric washing machine, and electric sewing machine. Last month he used 25 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1, including 25 cents paid on his line—making his electricity cost 75 cents.

Mr. Eugene Babb, who lives 7 miles from Corinth, uses lights in his home (17 drops), 2 radios, electric iron, electric fans, electric washing machine, and electric pump. Last month he used 65 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $2.45.

Mr. Babb writes:

My electric bill, according to the T. V. A. yardstick, is $1.80, but the members are paying for our distribution system at 1 cent a kilowatt-hour. Also, our house is piped for hot and cold water connected to a 45-pound-pressure tank and supplies water for household, bath, and stock—½-horsepower pump.

Mr. R. D. Thomas, who lives 2 miles from Corinth, uses lights, radio, and electric iron. Last month he used 25 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1 including 25 cents payment on his line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. George W. Ruff, one of the leading dairy farmers of Mississippi, who lives 3 miles out from Tupelo, writes me that he has lights in his home, barn and garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, vacuum cleaner, fans and electric range. He also uses two 3,000-watt electric heaters, one 2,000-watt electric heater, and one 1,200-watt electric heater. He sells pasteurized "Grade A" milk in the city of Tupelo.

Last month Mr. Ruff used 3,519 kilowatt-hours of electricity, for which he paid $27.39. He formerly secured power from the Mississippi Power Co., and to his letter he adds the following postscript:

This 3,519 kilowatt-hours, which cost me $27.39, under the old Mississippi Power Co. rates would have cost $118.82—a saving of $91.43 for this 1 month.

Mr. Lee Gray lives 2 miles from Corinth, uses lights in his home, barn, and garage, a radio, an electric refrigerator, an electric iron, electric fans, electric sewing machine, and an electric range. In February he used 100 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $3.50, including $1 amortization payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $2.50. Mr. Gray writes:

This T. V. A. power is really a godsend to the middle classes of people.

Mr. G. W. Bynum, Jr., of Rienzi, Miss., uses lights, a radio, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric percolator, and a 2-eye 600-watt table stove. Last month he used 39 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.56, including 39 cents payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.17.

Mr. J. M. Gilton, who lives 6 miles from Corinth, uses lights, a radio, an electric iron, and electric fans. Last month he used 20 kilowatt-hours and it cost him $1 (the minimum charge) which included a payment of 25 cents on his line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. Fred Haynes, who lives 1 mile from Corinth, uses lights, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric range, and electric washing machine. His bill for February amounted to 182 kilowatt-hours, and cost him $5.14, including $1 payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $4.14.

Mr. J. T. Dyer, who lives 5 miles from Tupelo uses lights in his home, barn, garage, and smokehouse, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans and electric corn popper. Last month he used 34 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.36, which included 34 cents paid on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.02.

Mr. D. B. Niblett, who lives 9 miles from Tupelo, uses lights in his home, barn, and garage, a radio, electric iron, electric water pump. His last monthly bill was for 29 kilowatt-hours, and cost him $1.16, including a 29-cent payment on his line. Mr. Niblett writes in a postscript as follows:

My power bills before I got on the T. V. A. line ran from $3.25 to $4.25 a month for the same amount of power I am now using. So I figure T. V. A. is saving me from $25 to $40 a year. Hope you can spread T. V. A. all over the U. S. A.

Mr. J. H. Hinton, who lives 3½ miles from Corinth, uses lights in his home and barn, radio, an electric refrigerator, electric iron, and electric fans. Last month he used 21 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1, including 25 cents paid on line. He writes the following postscript: "I want to thank you for making this possible. My bill has never been over $3, which it was in August."

Mr. J. B. Hughes, who lives 9 miles from Corinth, uses lights, radio, electric iron, electric fans, electric washing machine, electric pad, and an electric hot plate. Last month he used 33 kilowatt-hours, and it cost him $1.32, which included a 33-cent payment on his line—making his electricity cost him 99 cents.

Mrs. Dan E. Sullivan, who lives 9 miles from Tupelo, uses lights, refrigerator, electric range, electric iron, electric fan, electric heater, radio, an electric pump supplying water in kitchen, bathroom, yard, and barn. Last month used 50 kilowatt-hours which cost them $2, including a 50-cent payment on amortization of line. Mrs. Sullivan writes, "We farmers' wives, with the advent of T. V. A., can have just about any convenience that money can buy, and I am happy to say that in our community you can see a light in almost every home."

Mr. J. R. Cates, 9 miles from Corinth, uses lights, radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric range, and electric brooder. His last monthly bill was for 285 kilowatt-hours, and cost him $5.35.

Rev. B. P. Fullilove, lives near Rienzi, uses lights, radio, and 2 electric irons. Last month used 26 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.04, including a 26-cent payment on amortization of line—making his electricity cost him 78 cents.

Mr. Holland Rogers, lives 3 miles from Plantersville, uses lights, a radio, an electric iron, electric fans, and an electric range. Last month he used 50 kilowatt-hours which cost him $2, including a 50-cent payment on his line. Mr. Rogers writes: "John, I think this is the best thing the Government has ever done for the country people. The stove is a real gift. I wouldn't tote the ashes from a wood stove for this cost."

Mr. James M. Johnson lives 3 miles from Tupelo, uses lights in his home, barn, and garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric pump for milk-refrigerating plant, 1-horsepower compressor for refrigerating unit, and electric water pump. Last month he used 277 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $6.27, including $1 payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $5.27.

Mr. Tom Llewellyn lives 3½ miles from Tupelo, uses lights, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric fans, and two-burner hot plate. Last month he used 30 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.20, including 30-cent payment on line—making his electricity cost him 90 cents.

Mr. J. L. Gunter lives at Plantersville, uses lights, a radio, and electric iron. His last monthly bill was for 34 kilowatt-hours, and cost him $1.36, including 34-cent payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.02.

Mr. L. M. Baker lives 6 miles from Tupelo, uses lights, a radio, electric iron, and electric fans. Last month he used 24 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1, including 25-cent payment on line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. Baker writes: "Before we received T. V. A. power my light bill was from $3 to $4 per month for the same amount of kilowatt-hours."

Mr. O. L. Carter lives 6 miles from Corinth, uses lights, radio, and electric iron. Last month he used 34 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.36, including a payment of 34 cents on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.02.

Mr. Bill Knight lives 4 miles from Slatton, uses lights, radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, and electric fans. Last month used 30 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.20, including a 30-cent payment on line—making his electricity cost him 90 cents.

Some of these farmers turn their refrigerators off in cold weather to save expenses. That may account for some of these bills being so extremely low for the month of February.

Mr. O. E. Perry lives at Rienzi, uses lights, radio, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, and waffle irons. Last month he used 40 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.60, including 40 cents on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.20.

Dr. R. W. Carruth lives 8½ miles from Tupelo; uses lights in his home, office, barn, and garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric range, electric water pump, electric bathroom heater, electric clock, and electric waffle irons. Last month he used 316 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $6.66, including $1 payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $5.66.

Mr. J. A. Pierce lives 4 miles from Tupelo; uses lights, radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans. Last month he used 76 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $2.78, including 76 cents paid on his line—making his electricity cost him $2.02.

Mr. R. E. Baker lives 7 miles from Corinth; uses lights, radio, electric iron, and washing machine. Last month he used 49 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.96, including 49 cents payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.47.

J. S. Houston lives 7 miles from Corinth; uses lights, radio, electric iron, and electric fans. Last month he used 51 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $2.03, including 50 cents payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.52.

Mr. W. R. Benham lives 1 mile from Corinth, uses lights, two radios, two electric irons, electric fans, electric grill, and electric toaster. Last month he used 41 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $1.64, including 41 cents payment on line—making his electricity cost him $1.23.

Mr. O. S. Bean lives 2 miles from Tupelo, uses lights in his home, barn and garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, electric pump, and electric churn. Last month he used 64 kilowatt-hours, which cost him $2.42, including 64 cents on his line—making his electricity cost him $1.78.

R. T. Kelly of Saltillo, lives out 6 miles from Tupelo, uses lights, radio, electric iron, and electric fans. He used 25 kilowatt-hours of electricity during the month of February which cost him $1, including 25 cents to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. P. A. Hudson lives 7 miles from Rienzi, has lights in his home, a radio, an electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric washing machine, and an electric sewing machine. Last month he used 57 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $2.21, 57 cents of which goes to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $1.64.

Mr. H. M. Magers lives in the village of Kossuth, 9 miles from Corinth, has lights, radio, electric iron, electric fans, and an electric washing machine. Last month he used 40 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1.60, including 40 cents which goes to amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $1.20.

Mr. E. M. Perry, Jr., of Rienzi, has electric lights in his home and yard, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, an electric range, and electric woodworking equipment, including saws, lathes, drills, planers, etc. Last month he used 114 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $3.78, including $1 payment on his line—making his electricity cost him $2.78.

Mr. A. M. Sims of route 2, Tupelo, has lights, a radio, electric iron, electric fans, electric washing machine, electric range, and an electric water pump. His bill for last month was $2.99 for 83 kilowatt-hours, including $1 to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $1.99.

Mrs. W. B. Petty, lives 6 miles from Corinth, has electric lights, radio, electric iron, and an electric washing machine. Last month she used 16 kilowatt-hours, for which she paid $1 (the minimum charge) including 25 cents to help amortize the line—making her electricity cost her 75 cents.

Mr. L. S. Snipes lives 4½ miles from Tupelo, has lights in his home, a radio, and an electric iron. Last month he used 23 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1 (the minimum charge), 25 cents of which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. G. S. Roebke lives 1 mile from Rienzi, has lights in his home, in his garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, and an electric air compressor. He is on a commercial rate. Last month he used 88 kilowatt-hours which cost him $3.78, including 88 cents to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $2.90.

Mrs. E. Roebke lives 1 mile from Rienzi, has lights in her home and barn, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, and electric fans. Last month she used 46 kilowatt-hours which cost her $1.84, 46 cents of which goes to help amortize the line—making her electricity cost her $1.38.

Mr. W. M. Settle lives 9 miles from Corinth, has lights in his home and barn, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric range, electric fans, electric washing machine, and has electrified his corncrib and workshop. Last month he used 161 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $4.72, including $1 which goes to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $3.72.

Mr. Settle says in his letter:

T. V. A. simply makes life worth living in the country, removes drudgery from a number of our regular jobs, and does it on our own places and at our command.

Mr. H. E. Roebke, who lives in Rienzi, has lights in his home, barn, garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric range, electric toaster, electric percolator, a small electric stove, an electric hot-water heater, and an electric water pump which pumps water for 3 families and 10 head of livestock. Last month he used 265 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $6.15, including $1 to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $5.15.

Mr. W. C. Tanner lives 7 miles from Saltillo, is on a commercial rate, has lights in his home, a radio, electric coffee mill, and an electric pump. Last month he used 29 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1.39, including 29 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $1.10.

Mr. E. E. Long, superintendent of the Alcorn County Agricultural High School, at Kossuth, Miss., states that they have lights in 13 buildings, lights on the campus, in the barn, lights in the garage, seven radios, an electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric washing machine, three electric motors, electric shop tools, and last month they used 895 kilowatt-hours for which they paid $22.44. He says:

Our bill for running motor to generate our own electricity, before T. V. A., was about $45 per month. We did not have a third as much light as we now have. Our bill under T. V. A. has averaged less than $20 per month. We think it the greatest asset to a rural section.

Mr. R. J. Frost operates a store 6 miles from Tupelo; he has lights in his home and store, a radio, electric iron, electric fans, electric hot plate, and an electric percolator, and is on a commercial rate. Last month he used 18 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1.35, including 25 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $1.10.

Mr. C. W. Duncan lives 3 miles from Tupelo, has lights in his home and barn, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, and an automatic electric water system. Last month he used 95 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $3.35, including 95 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $2.40.

Mr. Troy Hurley, of Michie, Tenn., who is served by the Alcorn County (Miss.) Electric Power Association, has lights in his home and barn, a radio, electric iron, and electric fans. Last month he used 20 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1, including 25 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him 75 cents.

Mr. E. H. Burns lives 3 miles from Tupelo, has lights in his home, garage, and in his barn, one of which burns all night, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric hot plate, and an electric iron that does the ironing for three families each week. Last month he used 42 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $1.68, including 42 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $1.20.

Mr. C. W. Smith, of Kossuth, has lights in his home, an electric iron, two electric gasoline pumps, and an electric oil pump. He paid $1.44 last month for 36 kilowatt-hours, 36 cents of which goes to help amortize his line—making his electricity cost him $1.08.

Mr. H. J. Hoover, Stantonville, Tenn., who is served by the Alcorn County (Miss.) Electric Power Association, has lights, a radio, an electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, electric percolator, and an electric range. Last month he used 55 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $2.15, including 55 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $1.60.

Mr. R. L. Burns, Guys, Tenn., served by Alcorn County (Miss.) Power Association, has lights in his home, barn, and garage, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric vacuum cleaner, electric fans, electric churn, electric washing machine, electric sewing machine, electric water pump, and an electric battery charger. Last month he used 57 kilowatt-hours, for which he paid $2.21, including 57 cents which goes to help amortize the line—making his electricity cost him $1.64.

In his letter he says:

I am unable to command words to express my appreciation of T. V. A. My wife places the churn in the proper place—turns a button and T. V. A. does the work. She turns a faucet in the kitchen and gets cold and hot water. She places her foot on an attachment and again T. V. A. helps her by operating the sewing machine. When she places the milk and butter together with vegetables in the refrigerator T. V. A. is on the job, and when we need ice the trays are either full or soon will be.

Mr. W. H. Barnett, who lives 16 miles from Selmer, Tenn., and who is also served by the Alcorn County (Miss.) Electric Power Association, uses lights, a radio, electric refrigerator, electric iron, electric fans, electric washing machine, pump for running water in the home. His last monthly bill amounted to 38 kilowatt-hours and cost him $1.52, of which amount 38 cents went to amortize his line.

Mr. Barnett writes:

This electrical movement is the greatest help to the rural sections of anything we could have gotten. I use my refrigerator 365 days a year; in the winter to keep food from freezing, in the summer to freeze it. I have a washing machine that I do the family laundry for seven people, have the clothes on the line in from 1 to 2½ hours, which would require at least 1 whole day of back-breaking work, or about a $2 laundry bill each week. It has made it possible to have running water in the kitchen and bath room, hot and cold water, giving us city conveniences in God's great open country. Our radio brings us in touch with all the great happenings of the world. My electric iron is a great time saver, as well as making our laundry take on a more finished appearance, and the fan feels mighty good on a real hot day.

Mr. Chairman, I could fill page after page of the RECORD with similar examples; I have hundreds of them on my desk. But I will withhold them till another time.

This power question is the greatest issue now before us, and will be, probably, for the next 25 years.

This is one of the greatest programs for the benefit of the masses of the American people ever advanced by any administration since this Government began. It is the greatest farm relief movement ever proposed. It will not only benefit the farmers now, but will go on down to the future and bless the generations that are yet to come. If the Roosevelt Administration never does anything else, if it will just carry this power program to its logical conclusion, and insure to every individual electricity at reasonable rates, it will forever deserve the undying gratitude of mankind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law, Electric Home and Farm Authority, a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, shall continue until February 1, 1937, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President by Executive order, to be an agency of the United States. During the continuance of such agency, the present investment in the capital stock of such corporation, for the use and benefit of the United States, shall be continued, and such corporation is hereby authorized to use all its assets, including capital and net earnings therefrom, and all moneys which have been or may hereafter be allocated to or borrowed by it, in the exercise of its functions as such agency.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 add a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 2. The Corporation shall file with the President and with the Congress, in December of each year, a financial statement and a complete report as to the business of the Corporation covering the preceding governmental fiscal year. This report shall include an itemized statement of the cost of operation, the total number of employees and the names, salaries, and duties of all those receiving compensation at the rate of more than $1,500 a year."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is perfectly obvious and perfectly reasonable. We have seen this afternoon how helpful it would have been if this corporation, the Delaware corporation, had on file in this House a report which we could understand to guide us.

We have learned a great deal today about the Delaware corporation and its activities which we might have known before. I suggest, gentlemen of the House, that for an understanding of the attitude men are likely to acquire when they have unlimited authority as the agents of Congress you read the testimony of the Tennessee Valley Authority directors before the Committee on Military Affairs last summer.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If the gentleman will yield, the committee will accept his amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DEMPSEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill S. 3424, pursuant to House Resolution 461, he reported it back to the House with an amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 132, noes 29.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 267, nays 76, not voting 87, as follows:

THE TRANS-FLORIDA AND KIEL SHIP CANALS

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, last week I obtained consent to have extended in the RECORD a certain magazine article. At that time I had not fully complied with the rule. Since then I have complied with the rule, and I again ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a magazine article on the trans-Florida and Kiel Ship Canals, by Gilbert M. Youngberg, one of the country's outstanding engineers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

THE TRANS-FLORIDA AND KIEL SHIP CANALS—SOME COMPARISONS

(By Gilbert A. Youngberg, colonel (Engineers), U. S. Army, retired, consulting engineer, Jacksonville, Fla.)

(EDITORIAL NOTE.—Colonel Youngberg, the author of this article, has been almost continuously engaged since 1922 on studies of a waterway across the Peninsula of Florida. As United States district engineer for the Peninsula of Florida, his first report was submitted on May 4, 1923, and was published as Senate Document No. 179, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session. Subsequent to his retirement from active service in the Army he was commissioned by various interests to make further studies of the project and he is the principal author of the extensive report submitted in 1931 by the Jacksonville City Commission to the United States Engineer department, entitled "The Gulf-Atlantic Ship Canal Across Florida—An economic study." This report established a prima-facie case so strong that the United States Engineer department proceeded to make extensive and complete physical and economic surveys of the project which subsequently resulted in the construction work now in progress. However, the statements made in the article are based on official reports of various Federal agencies, including the United States Department of Commerce, United States Shipping Board, and others. Statements concerning the Kiel Canal are based on official publications of the organization administering that waterway.)

1. Editorial writers and others, particularly in the southern part of Florida, have strenuously opposed the Gulf-Atlantic Ship Canal now being constructed across the peninsula by the Federal Government. While many of them have heard of the Suez and Panama Canals, they apparently believe that the Florida cross-State canal is the first and only waterway ever projected across a peninsula. Some have voiced the view that even as a means of P. W. A. relief employment it is not very effective and that, considered as a navigation facility, it will be immensely costly, will have but little or no use, and that no economic warrant does or can exist for its construction in the interests of water-borne commerce.

2. Nevertheless, its construction is based on a fundamental principle of transportation as old as mankind. That principle is the same which results in a short cut across a vacant lot to a car station or a grocery store. It is identical with the reason for every rectification of our highways, and it is applied to every tunnel that is holed through a mountain to eliminate the curves and heavy grades, and consequent high transportation costs incident to carrying the railway over the mountain from one valley to another. It was this same basic principle which caused the construction of the Suez and Panama Canals.

3. Because of the geographic analogy existing between the Florida canal and the Kiel Canal in Europe, it is appropriate to consider the latter. This crosses the base of the Jutland Peninsula which projects northward from Germany and which contains the Kingdom of Denmark.

PENINSULAR SIMILARITIES

4. If the reader will imagine himself at the tip of the two peninsulas, in turn facing the base or neck of each he will find that the Baltic Sea on the left of the Jutland Peninsula corresponds with the Gulf of Mexico on the left of the Florida Peninsula; the North Sea on the right corresponds in a way to the Atlantic, and that the Kattegat and Skagerrak Straits around Skagen (Cape Skaw) correspond to the Straits of Florida around Cape Sable and the Florida Keys.

5. On the Baltic Sea there are the important ports of Stettin, Danzig, Gdynia, Riga, Reval, Leningrad, and others, including those on the east side of Sweden. (See plate.) These ports correspond to the American ports of Panama City, Pensacola, New Orleans, Galveston, Houston, and other ports on the Gulf of Mexico in the United States and in Mexico. (See map, p. 10, Southeastern Waterways, vol. I, no. 1, for January 1936.)

6. In Europe the North Sea and Atlantic ports of Hamburg, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Antwerp, and LeHavre on the Continent, and London, Hull, Edinburgh, and other ports on the east coast of England and Scotland, all of which are separated from the Baltic Sea by the Jutland Peninsula, correspond to the American Atlantic coast ports of Jacksonville, Savannah, Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other ports in the United States and in Canada, which are separated from the Gulf ports by the peninsula of Florida.

THE GREAT CIRCLE SAILING ROUTE

7. In comparing the Kiel Canal with the trans-Florida ship canal there is, however, one important feature in favor of the latter project. This lies in the fact that trans-Atlantic vessels plying direct between any two ports in America and Europe try to follow the great circle route, after giving due regard to ocean currents, hazards of icebergs, and other conditions which affect the safety of navigation at sea. The advantage of the great circle route is apparent on a globe, but it is not at all apparent on a flat map, particularly if the latter is on the customary rectangular or Mercator's projection.

8. The British Isles lie athwart the great circle route between the westerly entrance to the Kiel Canal and the North American ports. Therefore vessels plying direct between New York, for instance, and the Baltic ports approximate the great circle route by going to Pentland Firth, north of Scotland, thence across the North Sea, and around the Skaw, to the east of Denmark, for the reason that this route is somewhat shorter than that through the English Channel and around the Skaw or through the canal.

9. The corresponding condition does not apply to the Florida ship canal. It will afford a very decided short cut for all shipping plying between Gulf ports and those on either side of the Atlantic Ocean, including ports in the Mediterranean and some ports on the northwest coast of Africa. The Florida canal approximates more closely than the Florida Straits to the great-circle route between ports in the Gulf of Mexico and ports in Europe, including those on the Baltic. For example, a vessel plying direct between Galveston, on the Gulf of Mexico, and Gdynia, on the Baltic Sea, will find its shortest distance by using the Florida canal rather than by going on through the Florida Straits. This applies to all European and Mediterranean ports and to all American ports north of Jacksonville. This advantage presented by the Florida canal is increased, on the whole, by reason of the Gulf Stream and certain other factors which affect in various ways round-trip navigation through the Florida Straits as compared with navigation through the proposed canal.

10. All the vessels engaged in the North Atlantic trade will profit by using the latter canal. However, because the Kiel Canal does not greatly shorten the North Atlantic great-circle route between Baltic and American ports, the latter traffic does not pass through the Kiel Canal.

11. It follows, then, that since the latter canal does not afford the trans-Atlantic commerce the same degree of benefit being offered by the Florida canal, the traffic of the former may be conservatively taken as an index of the commercial possibilities and benefits to accrue from the latter.

RELATIVE DIMENSIONS

12. The comparative dimensions are indicated in the figures on the plate.

13. The Kiel Canal has a bottom width of only 144 feet, while the Florida canal will have a minimum width of 250 feet for about 60 miles and the rest will apparently be not less than 400 feet wide. The Kiel Canal has a center depth of 36 feet, in order to accommodate vessels of the German Navy, but most of the merchant vessels using the canal have a draft of not over 21 feet, and they may pass or meet other vessels without stopping. For deeper draft vessels, bypasses, or lay-bys are provided after the manner of railway sidings. These are equipped with posts for the mooring of vessels which must take the siding and come to a full stop. Of these bypasses, there are 11, the four largest of which are each 3,600 feet long by 540 feet wide.

14. The Florida canal will be sufficiently wide so that vessels may pass or meet without lay-bys and without any great reduction in speed. It will have a depth of 32 feet or more and will accommodate vessels having a loaded draft of 30 feet. This draft embraces all but a small percentage of vessels in the Gulf trade.

15. In 1929, out of a total of 1,487 ships entering the Gulf and making 10,341 one-way voyages and which might have used the ship canal to advantage, there were only 11 ships, making 96 voyages, that exceeded 30 feet in draft. In general, 95 percent of the commerce of the world is carried in vessels of 30 feet draft or less.

16. For strategic reasons American war vessels no longer operate in the Gulf, and there is no need for an excessively deep canal to accommodate them. However, the canal has a wartime advantage in that it will facilitate the movement of supplies or munitions of war from the numerous ports in the Gulf. Cotton, petroleum, grain, and other products produced in the great valley of the United States are all "materials of war" and find their natural outlet through the Gulf ports and hence through the trans-Florida canal, which can be defended against an enemy with much greater ease than the channels between the Florida Peninsula and Yucatan.

17. The Kiel Canal is 53.2 nautical or 58.5 statute miles in length, while the Florida canal will be about 195 statute miles long from the ends of the jetties in the Atlantic and the Gulf, respectively. Notwithstanding this disparity in length, the Florida canal will afford greater total savings to shipping in point of time and distance than results from the Kiel Canal.

VESSEL SPEEDS

18. Contrary to statements made by numerous misinformed writers, engineers, and others in Florida, a very considerable speed can be maintained in the Florida canal. In the relatively narrow Kiel Canal a speed of 8.1 knots, or 9 miles, per hour is permitted, and a speed of not less than 5.4 knots, or 6 miles, per hour must be maintained by order of the management. If a vessel under her own power cannot make this speed, she must take a tug. Incidentally, "tug trains" are made up consisting of sailing vessels, barges, and other craft. The number of such vessels is decreasing with the improvement in Diesel engines. In 1912 some 34,804 vessels were towed in 12,487 tug trains. The average running time for transit was 17¼ hours—a rate of 3¼ miles per hour. In 1927 only 2,864 vessels were towed in 1,650 tug trains. The average transit time was 19¼ hours, or a rate of 6 miles per hour. This reduction in time is due to improvements made in the canal prism in recent years. For vessels moving under their own power the transit through the canal is made in 7 to 7½ hours, according to the draft of the vessels. Incidentally, this compares very favorably with the transit of United States naval vessels through the Panama Canal under emergency conditions. The Panama Canal is 50 miles long, and during the World War a United States Navy destroyer passed through in 4 hours and 10 minutes, but 8 hours is a fair minimum time for transit, including lockages and other delays. In 1934 an entire fleet of 110 war vessels was passed in 48 hours. Authorities estimate that the Florida canal will permit an average speed of at least 7.5 knots, and that 25 hours will suffice for the transit.

DISTANCE AND TIME SAVINGS

19. From its tip to the median point on the Kiel Canal, the Jutland Peninsula measures about 250 miles, while the corresponding distance in the Florida Peninsula is 350 miles. The Kiel Canal saves about 22 hours on a voyage from Rotterdam on the Atlantic to Stettin on the Baltic. The Florida canal will, however, save about 32 hours on a voyage from Mobile, on the Gulf, to Savannah, or other United States ports in the Atlantic. On return, from the Atlantic ports to Mobile, the time savings will be 48 hours. The difference between the northbound and southbound savings is due to the influence of the Gulf Stream as affecting navigation through the straits and not affecting navigation through the canal.

20. The savings in time in all cases above are on the basis of a vessel with a speed of 8.5 knots in the open ocean. On a trip from Gibraltar (the entrance to the Mediterranean) to Tampa, the canal would save about 12 hours on a 10-knot ship and from New York to Tampa the saving would be 32 hours. However, from Tampa to New York the saving would be 20 hours, or a total of 52 hours on a round trip. For an 8.5-knot ship, the round-trip saving between Tampa and New York would be 62 hours. In all these calculations due account has been taken of the effect of the Gulf Stream and of the speed incident to navigation in the canal. The sailing distances involved are those computed by the United States Hydrographic Office, and conform to the approved sailing lines.

BRIDGES

21. It is interesting to observe that the Kiel Canal traverses a thickly populated country with numerous large cities in Denmark and in Germany, with a correspondingly heavy highway and railway traffic. No bridges are allowed to interfere with the free continuous movement of vessels. Four main-line railways are conducted across the canal by high-level bridges, affording a vertical clearance of 42 meters, or over 140 feet above the water. There is one highway bridge at high level and there is one swing bridge at a somewhat lower level used as a combination railway and highway bridge. It is arranged for specially quick operation. Numerous other highways are provided with ferries, of which there are 17 crossing the canal.

22. It may be remarked here that the Cape Cod Canal is crossed by only two highway bridges, each with a vertical clearance of 135 feet, and one railway lift bridge, which is habitually in an open position high above the water. It is lowered on the approach of a train. This mode of operation is the reverse of the customary arrangement whereby the bridges are usually closed and are opened only upon the approach of a vessel.

TOLLS

23. The Kiel Canal is operated as a toll canal. In 1931 the revenues were 6,137,000 marks, and the average charge was 0.34 marks per net registered ton. At the average rate of exchange this toll was equal to 8.0343 cents per net registered ton.

24. At one time a corporation was formed by act of State legislature with a view to constructing and operating a Florida Ship Canal. Application was made to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan and it was necessary to consider the canal as a self-liquidating project. Under these circumstances it could only be liquidated by assessing tolls and this idea, long since abandoned, is apparently the origin of the comment that the project cannot be liquidated on a toll basis. There is, however, good reason for stating that on the very low basis of 8-cent toll per ton, the revenues would serve to maintain and operate the canal and amortize the principal in 80 years, or less—particularly if interest be computed at the low rates at which the Federal Government has been able to obtain funds. Moreover, the benefits to accrue to shipping would be such as to justify a toll considerably in excess of 8 cents per ton. On petroleum products the savings, conservatively figured, would exceed 14 cents per long ton of cargo and would exceed 19 cents per ton of ordinary dry cargo as carried on freighters and combination freight and passenger vessels. However, since there are more than a dozen kinds of tons, it is important to observe a proper distinction between a ton of cargo which could be 2,000 or 2,240 pounds and a net registered ton which has 100 cubic feet of space. Tolls are usually based on the net registered ton, but the Suez and Panama Canals have their own rules for measuring the tonnage of vessels.

25. However, with reference to tolls, it should be noted that in 1796 Congress passed a resolution declaring navigable waters of the United States to be public highways forever free. This resolution was reenacted in somewhat different language in 1884 and is a fixed policy of the Federal Government. Many millions of dollars have been spent by the Government in creating artificial channels in Biscayne Bay for the benefit of Miami, in improving natural channels in Tampa Bay for the benefit of Tampa and other ports, and in improving St. Johns River channel for the benefit of Jacksonville. The Government has spent many other millions for numerous other seaports and for the improvement of the Mississippi, Ohio, and other rivers, as well as for artificial inland waterways, such as the Atlantic Intracoastal and the Gulf Canals. It has never sought to levy tolls or port dues on vessels using these improvements. The expenditure of Federal funds has been predicated on general benefits to commerce, including such intangibles as "increased safety and convenience in navigation." (See Reports on Miami Harbor, H. Doc. No. 15, 71st Cong., 2d sess., and on Tampa Bay, S. Doc. No. 22, 72d Cong., 1st sess., and numerous other Federal project documents.)

26. The official reports on the Florida ship canal contain extended discussion of the tolls that might be collected and the extent to which they would justify the project if tolls should be levied. The reports also contain extended discussions of the general intangible benefits which would justify the project in the interests of the commerce of the United States. The reports on the canal fully justify its construction as a Federal project in the same sense that they fully justify the extensive improvements now being made in Biscayne Bay, in Tampa Bay, and those projected for the harbor of Jacksonville and many other cities.

27. Congress has power to levy tolls, despite the policy heretofore established. It might decide to levy tolls on foreign vessels and not levy tolls on American-flag vessels. Such a course would result in a very substantial and indirect subsidy to the American merchant marine, which subsidy is very greatly needed.

SHIPS AND CARGOES

28. Through the Kiel Canal, the predominant traffic is coastwise; that is, it consists of trade between ports on the North Sea and the Baltic. It is conducted in a great number and variety of craft, but not of a very great aggregate tonnage. In 1929, 49,000 so-called ships passed through the canal, while the net registered tonnage was only 21,740,087 tons. Other reports show over 56,000 separate craft or voyages and over 24,000,000 tons. For 1929, the statistics show 26,585 vessels as steam or motor ships having a net registered tonnage of 20,109,247 tons.

29. For the Florida canal, a very complete analysis was made of the shipping for 1929. Every vessel was traced into and out of the Gulf, and, out of a total of 1,971 vessels carrying the total foreign and domestic commerce of the United States Gulf coast ports, it was found that 1,487 different ships made 10,341 voyages that could have used the canal to advantage. The total net registered tonnage for these voyages was 38,545,124, while the cargo amounted to 45,174,704 tons of 2,000 pounds each. Of these voyages, 7,610 were made under the American flag, with a net tonnage of about 28,800,000 tons. A similar analysis of the 1931 commerce showed 9,575 potential transits. The reduction below the 1929 figures was due to the smaller number of foreign-flag vessels, and this, in turn, was due to the world-wide depression and the corresponding reduction in commerce.

30. The analyses above mentioned were limited to ocean-going vessels, but the canal, once constructed, would show a very considerable traffic in self-propelled and towed barges. It has been estimated that this trade will amount to over 1,400,000 tons annually, on which the average savings in transport costs will exceed 80 cents per ton. In addition, there will be a large movement of yachts and other pleasure craft, with correspondingly large money benefits to the communities of Florida.

THE COMMERCE OF THE GULF PORTS

31. In recent years the Gulf ports have shown a relative gain in their share of the total domestic and foreign commerce of the United States. In 1932 these ports handled 9.2 percent of the total water-borne commerce of the United States, but in 1932 it had increased to 17.6 percent. In that period the total water-borne commerce of the United States declined from 449,000,000 tons to 301,000,000 tons, but the commerce of the Gulf ports increased from 41,000,000 tons to 53,000,000 tons.

32. Furthermore, of the total commerce of the Gulf ports, the greater part is coastwise. This consists very largely of trade between the ports on the Gulf and those on the Atlantic. As shown in the upper corner of the plate, this trade in 1932 amounted to nearly 38,500,000 long tons and was 72.5 percent of the total Gulf ports trade. During the depression of recent years foreign trade of the Gulf ports in 1932 was about 25 percent of their total commerce. An analysis of this foreign commerce indicates that about 70 percent thereof may be fairly considered as potential traffic for the Florida ship canal. This, together with the coastwise traffic, indicates a total potential traffic of not less than 39,000,000 short tons which will profit by the "short cut" ship canal between the Gulf and the Atlantic coast. The resulting savings based on the operating costs and fixed charges of the vessels are evaluated at about 16 cents per ton. This figure might well have been considered in determining tolls, for which 8 cents per ton has been suggested in some quarters. However, aside from these benefits, calculated on operating costs and fixed charges, there are other collateral benefits amounting to millions of dollars annually on which it would not be practicable to levy tolls or taxes for the operation of the waterway.

THE PANAMA AND SUEZ CANALS

33. Various persons not familiar with commercial statistics have sought to compare the Florida canal with the Panama Canal and have asserted that the traffic on the Florida canal cannot possibly approximate one-half of the traffic of the Panama Canal. They are grossly in error. Notwithstanding its great advantage, the traffic in the latter is exceeded by the potential traffic on the former.

34. As compared with the Cape Horn route, the Panama Canal saves over 8,000 miles of distance between United States Pacific coast ports and such a typical port as Norfolk on the Atlantic coast. In the calendar year 1932 the Panama Canal transited 4,367 vessels, carrying 18,909,938 long-tons of cargo. The net registered tonnage was 16,573,865 tons. For the "big year" of 1929 the figures were 6,430 ships and 31,450,493 long-tons of cargo.

35. In the first 10 months of 1935 the Panama Canal transited 4,175 vessels, with a net registered tonnage of about 17,600,000 tons. In the same time, the Suez Canal transited 4,951 vessels of about 17,800,000 net registered tons. The Italian military operations in Ethiopia account for a considerable part of this Suez traffic.

36. From the foregoing statements it will be noted that the Kiel Canal transits more ships than either the Suez or the Panama Canal. The analyses of the commerce of the ports of the Gulf of Mexico, made by two different and unbiased agencies, for the years 1929 and 1931 clearly show that the potential traffic for the Florida canal exceeds that of the Kiel Canal, which in turn approximates that of either the Suez or the Panama Canal.

37. It does not matter that the Florida canal will be longer than any of the others mentioned. It is important, however, that its navigable capacity is so great that it will even exceed the capacity of the navigable channels leading to the port of Houston and to numerous other ports on the Gulf and Atlantic coasts, and its capacity will at least equal the navigable capacity of the present channel from the ocean to the harbor of Jacksonville. In other words, the canal will permit a very free and speedy vessel movement. It is important also that notwithstanding its length it will still save many miles and many hours or days and many dollars for vessels plying between ports on the Gulf of Mexico and ports on either side of the North Atlantic Ocean and in the Mediterranean. Obviously, with the great volume of traffic to be accommodated, it will be equipped for navigation at all hours of the day and night, and will be equipped with a signal system which will warn bridge tenders, as well as the officers navigating the ships as to the possibility of immediate passage through any bridge. It is highly probable that railway bridges will conform to the Cape Cod practice, and will habitually be in the open position to permit the passage of vessels and will be brought into the closed position only upon the approach of trains.

CONCLUSION

38. Water-borne commerce is not a new thing under the sun, nor are canals a new-fangled notion. Their origins are shrouded in the mists of the most remote antiquity. Various bureaus of the Federal Government collect and compile complete statistics as to the movement of freight by water as well as by rail. Figures are available as to the cost of building, maintaining, and operating ships under various conditions, not only in the open waters of the ocean but also in harbor and inland channels. Copious figures exist as to the cost of excavating earth and rock and as to costs of all other elements entering into canal construction. Engineers and others are capable of digesting all these figures and of estimating costs of constructing, maintaining, and operating the Florida ship canal. They are also capable of evaluating the benefits to accrue to commerce. They are able to balance one against the other with a view to determining what is the economic justification for the construction of a trans-Florida canal. Three successive but independent boards, consisting of the most capable engineers in the country, have carefully investigated the project and have pronounced its construction as being in the interests of the United States.

39. In view of all these facts, in view of all the experience with traffic through the Suez and Panama Canals, and particularly in view of the experience in the Kiel, Corinth, and Welland Canals, which are analogous to the trans-Florida canal in view of all the commercial statistics on which to base calculations of the potential traffic, there is no room for doubt that the Gulf-Atlantic Ship Canal across Florida will serve a useful purpose and that there is ample economic warrant for its construction.

THE PEOPLE OF HAWAII

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of a radio address I made on Monday last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech delivered by me on Monday, March 23, 1936, over the Columbia Broadcasting System, station WJSV, as amplified:

To my friends who may be listening to this broadcast here on the mainland and in Hawaii, kuu aina aloha, greetings and aloha nui. There have been so many loose statements about the people of Hawaii, based on incorrect figures and erroneous ethnology, that I have felt it incumbent upon me as the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii to make an effort to tell the people of America the truth concerning our island peoples. I am therefore very appreciative of the courtesy of the Columbia Broadcasting System in allowing me the opportunity to do so.

At different times we have been said to be 90 percent Asiatic, which is quite untrue; or again that over 60 percent of our people are of Japanese ancestry, which is equally false. A recent public document lists our people into three classes—whites, Asiatics, and others. This lumps the entire body of Hawaiians and part Hawaiians under the somewhat casual and anonymous classification, others, including myself, with my Scotch-Yankee-Hawaiian ancestry, and many thousands like me. Under Asiatics there are included 130,000 native-born American citizens, at least 30,000 of whom are children of native-born parents; and a large number descended from immigrants who first came to Hawaii from 50 to 100 years ago. I wonder how long these perfectly good Americans will continue to be dubbed Asiatics.

A brief review of Hawaiian history may help to fix in your mind the racial groups comprising our present-day population. When Hawaii was discovered to the western world the islands had a population of 250,000 or more native Hawaiians. Shortly after this event the several islands were consolidated under one ruler and established as an independent kingdom under native Hawaiian monarchs. A republic succeeded this kingdom until the little nation, which had been independent for a hundred years, was annexed to the United States by its own request. During the period of its independence the Hawaiian population decreased so rapidly that immigration was undertaken with the view, first, of revitalizing the native people. Later the economic needs of the islands influenced the government to continue immigration, in order to provide sufficient labor for the country's growing industries. Up to the time of annexation, therefore, we had brought into Hawaii three principal racial groups, the Chinese, the Portuguese, and the Japanese, besides some smaller groups of other races. There had also been a steady influx of Anglo-Saxons—traders, missionaries, and professional men—throughout the entire period from the time of the discovery of the islands until annexation. When the American flag was hoisted over the islands Chinese immigration, which had already ceased, was prohibited by United States law. Soon after annexation the gentleman's agreement between Japan and the United States barred the further immigration of Japanese. Since then the only immigration of any material numbers that has taken place has been of Filipinos. The story of immigration to Hawaii has its analogy to the larger scene of the American mainland, the insistent demands of a former rapid industrial expansion attracting large numbers of new people.

Annexed to the United States on July 7, 1898, and incorporated as the Territory of Hawaii on July 14, 1900, Hawaii has been completely under the influence of American institutions for more than a generation. In fact, for many years prior to annexation American culture was paramount in the islands. Regularly since 1903 Hawaii has been appealing to be admitted as a State. In effect, Hawaii says to the American Nation, "Please look us over, study our community life in all of its phases, and see if we are not already long past the stage of compliance with every one of the requisites to statehood that has been applied to any one of our predecessors; and grant us that full participation in the national life that is every American's right, a right for which we of Hawaii made real sacrifices to attain."

Hawaii's most recent plea has been more thoroughly supported and more sympathetically considered by the United States than previously. We have grown from a people of 154,000 when annexed to one of 384,000 now, more than doubling our population in 35 years. The increase in our wealth has kept pace or even outstripped the increase in people. On this stable economic foundation we have built a modern and thoroughly American community. Federal statistics will confirm our claim that we carry a greater share of the national tax burden than many States; that we maintain in labor conditions, in government, education, social welfare, and every other aspect of American civilization as high or higher standards than continental United States.

Nearly all that I have said is granted by those whom opportunity has informed concerning Hawaii and its people, and many such accept the final conclusion: that Hawaii is entitled to statehood. Others hesitate, and find in the racial background of our people an argument for postponing or denying Hawaii's plea. Frankly, I do not believe one's racial ancestry can be raised against any native-born American citizen, and the simple truth of the matter is that Hawaii had, at the time of annexation, the racial elements now complained of in practically the same proportions as today, with the exception of the Filipino group. It would appear to be a fair statement that any doubts as to the racial background of Hawaii's people might more properly have been made in 1898; and not now, when our alien people are proportionately less in number than ever before, and our citizenship is more overwhelmingly native born.

As of June 30, 1935, the entire population of Hawaii numbered 384,437 persons. Of this total slightly more than 75 percent, or 291,645, are citizens of the United States, principally by birth; and slightly less than 25 percent, or 92,792, are aliens. The Hawaiians and part Hawaiians number a total of 57,688 people, all of them citizens of the United States, being 15 percent of the total population, and 20 percent of the citizen population. It is quite untrue, as commonly stated, that the native Hawaiian people are dying out; they are marrying out; intermarrying freely with all the other races living in the islands. Even with this merging to form the new Hawaiian people, the rate of decrease of the older stock is steadily less, showing greater adaptation to the present environment, and a virile resistance to racial extinction. Numbering 29,799 in 1900, the pure Hawaiians now number 21,710; a substantial decrease to be sure, but for the period covered, at a greatly retarded rate as compared with the preceding 35 years.

The part Hawaiians have, on the other hand, increased at a tremendous rate, both from natural fertility and a greater acquired immunity to the ills of civilization, and from additions through intermarriage. A total of 9,857 in 1900 has grown to 35,978 in 1935, over a threefold multiplication. There are more people of Hawaiian blood living in Hawaii today than there have been since 1866. The low-water mark of the Hawaiian people, considering the pure Hawaiians and the part Hawaiians as one group, was passed about 1896, and the future holds every promise that those who have some, at least, of the heritage of the old Polynesian race of Hawaii will take a steadily increasing part in the affairs of their native land. The part Hawaiian rate of increase is such that they will soon advance in proportionate numbers to be a half or more of the total citizens of Hawaii, according to careful estimates based on thorough studies by experts in the field of vital statistics. The character of their activity will be as thoroughly American as that of any people on the mainland. No Hawaiian desires any other destiny than to be a loyal citizen of the United States.

The Caucasian element in Hawaii number 88,423 people, or nearly a fourth of the whole population. Of this number, a small group, 3,639 persons, are eligible for naturalization, but are unable or unwilling, for one reason or another, to become American citizens.

The much larger number, 84,784 persons, are citizens, comprising about 30 percent of the citizen population. This latter number is divided between two major racial stocks; the Latins, principally Portuguese, numbering 36,032 people; and the Anglo-Saxons, numbering 48,752.

The Anglo-Saxons in Hawaii have been dominant for many years, almost from the time the American missionaries first brought Christianity to the islands 116 years ago. The great majority of this group are Americans, with smaller numbers of British and north European peoples. Included in this class are the descendants of those same American missionaries and other early American settlers, principally of New England origin.

The Latins comprise, besides the Portuguese, a smaller number of Puerto Ricans and a handful of Spaniards. The Portuguese in particular have been residents of the islands for several generations and are quite thoroughly assimilated to American standards.

The part-Hawaiians include many descendants of the early American and English settlers who intermarried with the Hawaiians. It is also true that the Polynesians, of whom the Hawaiians are a branch, are considered by many ethnologists to be of the Aryan race. This would include the Hawaiians as members of the Indo-European family of peoples. The total of the Hawaiian, part-Hawaiian, and Caucasian groups is 142,472 people, thoroughly American in every attitude, and comprising approximately half of the entire citizenry of the Territory.

The Chinese first came to Hawaii many years ago, and now comprise a total of 27,264 people, of whom 5,030 are aliens, being the older remnants of this early immigration, who are denied the privilege of naturalization by our laws. The 22,234 citizens of Chinese ancestry are in many cases the third generation from the original immigrant parents. Except for some slight cultural contacts with China, they are as essentially American as people of the same length of residence on the mainland.

Of the smaller racial elements, the Koreans number 6,668 persons, of whom 2,596 are aliens and 4,072 are citizens. The alien handful are the elderly parents, ineligible to naturalization, and the citizens are their American-born children.

The people of Japanese ancestry in Hawaii, a total of 148,972 persons, comprise 39 percent of the total population. Of this number, 40,617 are aliens, like the Chinese and Koreans, ineligible to naturalization. This latter group provides the bugaboo of the jingoes, although they consist of elderly men and women, ranging in age from 45 to 70 years, their average age being about 55 years. They arrived in Hawaii between 1885 and 1908; and practically none since the Immigration Act of 1924 placed an absolute ban upon Japanese immigration, which had, with minor exceptions, already ceased in 1908. No alien Japanese has had less than 12 years' residence in Hawaii, and the great majority of them have been in the islands more than 25 years. Much can be, and has been, accomplished in the American environment of Hawaii to convince these people that American institutions and democracy offer them and their children greater opportunities than they could expect in their former country. By the physical fact of age, the alien Japanese, as well as the smaller number of alien Chinese and Koreans, are passing off the stage at a rapid rate. Since the immigration of all three of these races was prohibited many years ago, and no replacements have come in since, it is a matter of a very few years when their only representatives will be native-born citizens of America. No one of our alien groups of the races ineligible to naturalization can migrate from Hawaii to the mainland, despite assertions to the contrary.

There is today a total of 108,355 American citizens of Japanese ancestry, being 37 percent of the entire citizenry. Alarmists view this fact with misgivings, which we of Hawaii consider to be without any foundation. The original Japanese immigration was of young adult couples, resulting in a high birth rate and a low death rate. Both rates have now become normal. The first generation native born show the same reaction to American conditions of living, with its higher standards, that every other immigrant people has shown. The birth rate of the native born is less than that of several other races in the Territory. Comprised in the total citizens of Japanese ancestry, there is already a considerable number of children whose parents were born in Hawaii, beginning the third generation from the original immigrants. Of the whole number, a very large proportion are still children, with many years intervening before they assume the responsibilities of citizenship. Hardly 25 percent are adults, ranging in years from 21 to 45. Approximately 75 percent of these new Americans range in age from infants in arms to just under their majority. Hawaii can and will mold these young folks into loyal citizens of the country of their nativity. The obvious everyday evidence in schools, sports, clothing, civic and social organizations, and political affiliations show beyond any reasonable doubt that these new citizens are accepting Americanization gratefully, as a high privilege, and are making every effort to live up to the obligations such citizenship entails, without abusing the privileges it grants.

The only new racial group that has entered Hawaii in any large numbers since annexation are the Filipinos; and, after all, they have been, and perhaps still are, until the final separation of the Philippine Islands from the United States, if not American citizens, at least American nationals. These people began to come to Hawaii in 1908, and, after increasing rapidly to a total of 63,052 in 1930, have now decreased to 54,668 persons. They have been returning voluntarily to the Philippines in a steady stream since 1930, and their further immigration is barred by the Philippine Independence Act. They can only be naturalized under special conditions, principally through honorable service in the military forces of the United States, so that 40,885 of the number in Hawaii are aliens, whose gradual return to their own islands can be taken for granted. The remaining 13,783 are, except for the few honorably discharged service men, a very young native-born group, whose potentialities or whose choice of citizenship is still conjectural. Certainly neither of these Filipino groups, alien or citizen, or both, constitute a problem either to the local community or to the Nation.

The people of Hawaii are then over 75 percent American citizens, principally by nativity. The less than 25 percent aliens are not being replaced by any new immigration. Practically a half of our citizenry are Hawaiians, Anglo-Saxons, and Latins. Another portion are of Chinese ancestry two and three generations back. Less than 40 percent are of Japanese racial extraction, brought up in a thoroughly American milieu and participating in the community life gradually as they successively come of age. No one racial group is in the majority. No possible combination, un-American in background, could control locally. Can anyone find in these conditions any menace to nationalism? Have not many parts of the mainland even smaller proportions of native-born citizens? Does any other part of the national domain do as much to weld together all its people in common loyalty to the ideals and institutions of our American democracy as Hawaii? Is it pertinent, with any one of America's constituent peoples, to go back of the simple fact of American citizenship by birth, to tag the children with the heritage of immigrant parents? Has not our experience over the years shown on the whole the falsity of such an attitude?

In closing, let me in all sincerity and with the utmost emphasis assure the American people that Hawaii, whatever its racial make-up.

Mahalo.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. POLK, for 10 days, on account of important business.

EFFORTS OF HEARST'S NEWSPAPERS TO CONTROL CONGRESSMEN

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes in order to read a letter that Mr. Hearst's Washington Times editor wrote to Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is an exact copy of a letter that William Randolph Hearst's Washington Times editor wrote to Texas. I quote it verbatim:

WASHINGTON TIMES,

THE NATIONAL DAILY,

Washington, D. C., March 6, 1936.

CITY EDITOR,

San Antonio, Tex.

DEAR SIR: Will you please furnish me with the following information for editorial use?

How many public-works projects has Representative THOMAS L. BLANTON been instrumental in getting in his district? And how much money do they involve?

What is the bonded indebtedness of Abilene, Tex.? How is the taxes in the town and county prorated? How much goes to paying the interest on the debts and how much to amortization?

What is the water rent in Abilene? How much property does BLANTON and his wife own? If you can, what is the water used for on his property—Irrigation, watering livestock? Is it necessary for him to use more water than would be used in a city house?

What is the gasoline tax? What is the tax on automobiles?

Are the roads in his neck of the woods in good condition? Has he ever had any special privileges shown in city or county improvements around his property?

And how much taxes does he pay, and for what?

I know this is a big order, but I would appreciate it if you could fill it as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

DAN E. O'CONNELL,
City Editor.

CANNOT DIG UP ANY SKELETONS

William Randolph Hearst can put his paid minions to digging and have them dig and dig and dig throughout my entire life, and he will not be able to find any skeletons.

I was born in our family home at the corner of Fannin and Lamar Streets, not far from the present Rice Hotel, in the city of Houston, which for enterprise and progressiveness will equal Washington, D. C., and attended the public schools of Houston. I attended the high school under "Uncle" Pugh Kirk at La Grange, Tex. I attended the University of Texas at Austin for 5 years and earned every dollar that paid for my training in the academic and law departments. I began practicing law at Cleburne, Tex., under Hon. Bill Ramsey in the office of Ramsey & Brown, than whom there was never a better firm of lawyers in Texas. I moved to western Texas in October 1897, and married in Albany, Tex., where I had built up a splendid law practice, and had one client, Mr. C. M. Cauble, who paid me an annual retainer of $5,000 per year for handling his big business, and, in addition, special fees in particular cases.

SACRIFICED PROPERTY IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. William Randolph Hearst and his prying newspapers will ascertain, if they get the facts, that I left a lucrative law practice, which had paid me many large fees, both in money and lands, to enter public office. For one fee I received a whole section of fine land, embracing 640 acres. For another fee I received 320 acres of land. For another fee I received a good farm. For a fee in another case I received $5,000 in cash.

At the time I gave up my law business to enter public office I then owned a fine home covering a whole block of land in Albany; I then owned the Gregg farm and pasture west of Albany; I then owned the McComb farm and pasture. I then owned what is known as the fair grounds, embracing 160 acres, north of Albany; I then owned a whole block of ground contiguous to the Reynolds Academy in Albany, upon which I had one of the finest purebred poultry farms in Texas, with a main poultry house 90 by 20 feet, with basement cellar for incubators underneath, and with double grazing pens for each breed. I had the finest Barred Rocks from E. B. Thompson, of Elmira, N. Y. I had the finest Wycoffe White Leghorns from New York. I had the finest Silver Penciled Wyandottes and Brown Leghorns and Buff Cochins and Rhode Island Reds and Houdans that could be found in the United States. I had fine turkeys and fine peafowls. I owned the tract of land northwest of Albany, and contiguous to the town, which is now the Country Club. I owned the Mountain Ranch just west of it. I owned some fine Hereford cattle. I owned some fine thoroughbred horses, including a number of Ellis Richardson "Bobby Beach" mares. I owned some standard-bred horses, headed by a fine Zola stallion, which I purchased from Henry Exall, of Dallas, Tex. I owned a flock of fine Shropshire sheep. I owned some fine registered Poland China hogs. I had 100 acres fenced with wolf-proof fencing for a breeding pasture. All of the foregoing is what I have given up and sacrificed in order to serve the people in public office. All that I have left is a farm at Lueders, Tex., which I have owned since 1898, without a dollar incumbrance against it, and I have paid out on it more taxes during the last 38 years than I have received in income from it, and I would have been better off if I had never owned it.

ABILENE, TEX., A CITY OF COLLEGES

Mr. Speaker, I have lived in Abilene, Tex., continuously since 1908. It is in Taylor County, which has 30 voting precincts. In the last election, 1934, with a prominent district judge and a prominent Texas legislator both running against me, and with numerous former candidates whom I have defeated living in my home city, I carried each and every one of the 30 voting precincts with a clear majority over both opponents. I offer that to Mr. William Randolph Hearst as my present standing with my neighbors of Abilene and Taylor Counties, with whom I have lived for the past 28 years. Likewise in my old home, Albany, and Shackelford County, where I practiced law, in the last election, 1934, I carried every voting precinct by a clear majority over both opponents. I offer that to Mr. William Randolph Hearst and his prying newspapers as to my standing at home.

WASHINGTON NEWSPAPERS SEEKING $8,500,000

Hearst's Washington Times and Washington Herald and Theodore Noyes' Washington Star and Eugene Meyer's Washington Post and Scripps-Howard's Washington News are all trying to make Congress appropriate $8,500,000 out of the Public Treasury as a contribution to the local civic expenses of Washington people so as to reduce the taxes of Washington people to the amount of $8,500,000. I have stood in their way. I have blocked their plan. I have shown that the people of Washington pay less taxes than any other people in the United States. I have shown that Washington people are the least taxed and the best treated of any people in the whole wide world.

My committee has gotten the House of Representatives to allow only $2,700,000 as a Federal contribution. The Washington newspapers want $8,500,000. That is the issue. The Washington newspapers think that if they can get me out of the way they will eventually get their $8,500,000. So they want me out of the way. Hearst's Washington editor, therefore, is snooping around in Texas trying to hurt me. I defy him. He cannot hurt me at home. The people I represent have known me too long. They have confidence in me. The Washington newspapers cannot destroy such confidence.

Mr. Speaker, since I have been making fights for the people, and having to meet opposition which such fights always incite, I have been gradually sacrificing all of the property that I possessed when I entered public life. I sold my fine home which I possessed. I sold three fine bungalow houses that I built myself in my home city of Abilene, and spent the proceeds in public work. I sold my Gregg farm. I sold the fairgrounds property which I mentioned. I sold my ranch at Albany that ran right up to and adjoined the city, and my 100-acre breeding pasture fenced with hog-proof fence, where I had as fine a bunch of registered Poland China hogs as you ever saw.

I sold my block of Shropshire sheep that I had been raising for some time. I sold all my Hereford cattle. I sold my bunch of standardbred and thoroughbred horses, 75 head at one time, to Mr. Louis H. Hill, of Albany. I sold it all to enter and continue in public service and to stay in Congress and not let the newspapers run me out. I am now living in a rented house, because I did not see fit to seek the path of least resistance and do nothing, but dared to oppose these newspapers when they seek things that are unjust to the American people.

If he will look in Abilene he will find that we pay water rent in accordance with the service that we get like other people. We do not get it for $6.60 a year per average family. There is an inheritance tax. There is an estate tax. There is none in Washington. There is no inheritance tax here. There is no estate tax here. There is no sales tax like they have over in Baltimore. There is no gift tax here. There is no income tax here. The entire tax that they pay is $1.50 per $100 on real and personal property that is assessed at less than half its value, with 2 cents gasoline tax, and only $1 for registration and license tags per year on each truck and limousine, whether a Ford or a $12,000 Rolls Royce.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I put in the RECORD sometime ago the actual tax that these Washington newspapers pay and the actual tax that a hundred of the big citizens here pay—citizens in Washington who get salaries ranging from $15,000 per year up to $75,000 per year. Mr. Montgomery, for instance, president of the Acacia Life Insurance Co., receives $75,000 a year. I showed you exactly what tax they paid. These papers cannot take it. They cannot take it. Here on election year they are snooping around down there in Texas, in my district, trying to find something they can hamstring me with when your appropriation bill goes to conference with the Senate. That is what they are trying to do. They are trying to hurt me here as your agent when I represent you in conference with the Senate. Thank God, they cannot do it. They cannot find a thing against me, during all the years of my life, that has not been honorable, upright, and decent. They will not find any record about me that we have about some connected with these newspapers. Because I showed that some of the high officials connected with the newspapers are paying no taxes and have mandamus suits against them now to compel them to pay their taxes, they are snooping around down there in Texas with such letters as this. Solely because I happen to have a good friend down in San Antonio, I get a copy of the letter; otherwise I would have had no knowledge of it. There are mighty few things that Hearst can do and get away with it. Everything about his crooked life is already known to some people; and if he keeps on, it will be known by all the people of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind my colleagues about the actual amount of taxes that are paid by these Washington newspapers and the officials who own them. Then they will understand just why they are so determined to undermine me, if possible, and get me out of their way. Their properties are rendered at only a part of what they are actually worth. None of them would sell their property for twice the amount at which same is rendered for taxes.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING

As to whether anyone is overtaxed can easily be disproved by showing the taxes they pay and the value at which their property is assessed and the rate. I quote the following from the hearings as official facts furnished by the tax assessor of the District, who has filled the office for the past 27 years.

THE WASHINGTON POST

We will take up now the Washington Post, which is owned by Mr. Eugene Meyer and his corporation. He renders the real-estate property of the Washington Post at an assessed value of $117,860, upon which an annual tax is paid of $1,767.90. Part of the real-estate taxes is on leased property, the lease requiring the Post to pay same. It renders tangible personal property at $320,260, upon which the tax is paid of $4,803.90. It renders intangibles at $218,456, upon which it pays an annual tax of $1,092.28. Thus the Washington Post's aggregate properties are rendered at an assessed value of $656,576, upon which it pays a total annual tax of only $7,663.08.

It pays water rent for 2,290,000 cubic feet of water per year of $1,203.57 for the Post's big plant and office building. Substantial citizens have filed evidence with this committee claiming that the Washington Post was worth $3,000,000, and that Eugene Meyer, through a collusive proceeding, swindled the McLean heirs out of it, having it foreclosed, and through a dummy buying it at auction for $825,000 and then incorporating it for $1,250,000.

EUGENE MEYER

Now, personally, Mr. Eugene Meyer, the owner of the Washington Post, in the way of taxes only pays the water rent on his wife's fine residence properties of $53.92 per year for 97,300 cubic feet of water. He renders a fine Packard family car, upon which he pays an annual tax of only $29.92, plus $1 for license tags.

For last year he rendered three Plymouth cars, one Witt-Will car, one Dodge, one Chevrolet, and one Ford, upon which he paid total taxes on all seven of them of $45.67, plus $7 for license number tags for all of them. This year only six automobiles are rendered.

Eugene Meyer's residence is in his wife's name, Mrs. Agnes Meyer, situated on lot 806, square 2568, the land being rendered at $79,797, and the improvements at $138,000, or a total of $214,797, and then she has 12 other lots rendered in her name connected with her residence and running to Sixteenth Street, rendered at $72,826, totaling $287,623, upon which the total tax paid on their family real estate is $4,314.35, and the value of her intangibles is $608, and the tax on her intangibles is $3.04.

Her tangible personal property is rendered at $30,000, and the tax on same is $450, or her total tax was $4,767.39 last year.

Here is the personal-tax rendition of Mr. Floyd R. Harrison, comptroller of the Washington Post. He renders no return on real property; he renders no personal property; he renders no property of any kind and pays no taxes. But there is a mandamus pending against him now.

As to that I quote from the hearings:

Mr. RICHARDS. We tried to get him to make a return on his personal property.

Mr. BLANTON. You tried to get him to make a return and he would not do it?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And you have a mandamus proceeding against him?

Mr. RICHARDS. We are trying to make him do it, and he will do it before we get through, too.

Mr. BLANTON. I assume that the comptroller of the Washington Post ought to have some property and ought to pay some taxes.

DAVID LAWRENCE

For instance, let us take Mr. David Lawrence—editor of the United States News—whose residence is at 3900 Nebraska Avenue, its assessed value being $133,390, upon which he pays an estate tax of $2,000.88 annually.

He has tangible personal property assessed at $3,000, upon which a tax of $45 is paid, and he has intangibles assessed at $216, on which a tax of $1.08 is paid. He pays an annual water rent of $24.49 for his fine $133,390 residential property.

Mr. Lawrence is shown by a recent statement in the Washington papers to have received an annual salary or income last year of $18,700. He renders a Cadillac automobile, for which he pays a personal tax of $1.80, and he also pays $1 for the annual license tag on his Cadillac automobile.

THEODORE NOYES

Then there is Mr. Theodore Noyes, who is one of the officials and part owner of the Washington Star. He is the chairman of the board of the Washington Star, and the newspapers here the other day stated that his salary or income last year was $42,120.

Personally he renders his residential property at 1730 New Hampshire Avenue NW. at an assessed value of $65,500, upon which he pays an annual tax of $982.50.

He has tangible personal property assessed at $7,500, upon which he pays a tax of $110.50.

He renders intangible property aggregating $621,520, upon which he pays a tax of $3,107.60, which is at the rate of one-half of 1 percent for intangibles.

He renders for taxes two family automobiles, an Auburn and a Lincoln, upon which he pays a personal tax on those two automobiles aggregating $57.75 per annum.

His annual water rent is only $23.05 on his fine residential property.

FLEMING NEWBOLD

Here is his business manager of the Washington Star, Mr. Fleming Newbold, who, the Washington papers stated, received a salary or income last year of $31,543. He renders his residential property at 1720 Massachusetts Avenue NW., at $31,455, upon which he pays an annual tax of $471.82. He renders intangible property of $40,728, upon which he pays an intangible tax of $203.64.

He renders tangible personal property of $4,500, upon which he pays a tax of $67.50.

He renders two family automobiles, both Packards, for which he pays an annual total tax of only $2.87 for the two Packards, and he pays $2, covering $1 apiece, for the automobile license tags on them, and his water rent on his residence property is only $10.45 per year.

THE WASHINGTON STAR

Now, the Evening Star, at Eleventh and Pennsylvania Avenue NW.—Theodore Noyes' newspaper—renders real property, a list of which I am going to have incorporated into the record here, and it totals in assessed value $2,249,586, upon which the Evening Star pays an annual tax of $33,743.80 for this year. In 1933 the real estate just referred to was assessed at a value of only $2,262,639, or the sum of $13,053 more in 1933 than it is assessed now, showing that they got their part of the arbitrary $130,000,000 reduction in the assessed valuation of properties testified to by Commissioner Hazen.

Mr. William P. Richards, tax assessor, prepared all this data, and he will tell you that he has verified as correct all of the facts I will give you concerning taxes paid here.

Now, the Evening Star renders personal tangible property at an assessed value of $453,092, upon which it pays an annual tax of $6,796.38. It renders intangible property at an assessed value of $2,296,512, upon which it pays an annual tax of $11,482.56.

Its annual water charge for its big plant and office building covering 1,622,000 cubic feet of water is $853.14 a year.

Last year it had 84 automobiles, upon which it paid a total tax of $3,791, personal property tax, plus $84, covering $1 each for the 84 cars for their license tags.

FRANK B. NOYES

To give you the entire picture of the Evening Star, I will give you the taxes paid by Mr. Frank B. Noyes, president of the Evening Star. The Washington newspapers the other day stated that his annual salary or income last year was $42,120.

Personally, Mr. Frank B. Noyes, president of the Washington Star, renders no real estate for taxes. He renders tangible personal property of $20,000, upon which he pays an annual tax of $300. He renders intangible property at $92,900, upon which he pays a tax of $464.50.

He renders for taxes his family car, a Stutz automobile, for which he pays a personal tax of only $1 per year, and he pays a $1 charge per year for license number tags.

HEARST'S HERALD AND TIMES

C. DORSEY WARFIELD

Both the Washington Herald and the Washington Times are incorporated under the name of "American Newspapers, Inc."

Mr. C. Dorsey Warfield is the assistant publisher of the Times. He pays no real-estate taxes. He pays on tangible personal property, at an assessed value of $2,500, the sum of $37.50. On intangibles, at an assessed value of $148, he pays 74 cents, and, on a family automobile, a Dodge, he pays $9.30. That is the total tax that the Times' assistant publisher pays.

ELEANOR PATTERSON

Now, with regard to the Washington Herald, unless a change has been made recently, Mrs. Eleanor Patterson, of 15 Dupont Circle, is the editor of the Herald. She is one of those whose taxes I was asked to check up. Here is her rendition. She has a residence at 15 Dupont Circle.

It is one of the finest residences in Washington. It is assessed at the value of $261,731. Upon that a tax is paid of $3,925.96.

She renders tangible personal property of $75,000 assessed value, upon which a tax is paid of $1,125. She renders intangible property of the value of $1,090,324, upon which a tax is paid of $5,451.62.

She pays an annual water rent on that extensive property of $81.80 per year for 153,300 cubic feet of water.

She renders four family automobiles—one Cadillac, two Packards, and one Chrysler—on the combined total of which she pays a personal property tax of only $30.66 a year, plus $4 for license-number tags on them.

ARTHUR G. NEWMYER

On the editorial page of the Washington Times, published by American Newspapers, Inc., which also publishes the Herald, there is given the name of Arthur G. Newmyer, publisher; J. J. Fitzpatrick, managing editor; and William C. Shelton, business manager.

Mr. Arthur G. Newmyer, the publisher of the Washington Times, lives at the Mayflower Hotel. He renders tangible personal property of the assessed value of $4,500, upon which he pays a tax of $67.50 per year.

He renders intangible property of an assessed value of $664, upon which he pays a tax of $3.32. That is all the tax that he pays in Washington.

J. J. FITZPATRICK

Mr. J. J. Fitzpatrick, the editor of the Washington Times, who lives at 3415 Fulton Street NW., in another's property, renders tangible personal property of the value of $60, upon which he pays a tax of 90 cents.

He renders two family automobiles, one a Cadillac and one a Pontiac, upon the two of which he pays an aggregate tax of $20.84 per year, plus $2 covering the license tax.

H. B. SPENCER

Mr. H. B. Spencer, who is president of the Fruit Growers Express, who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary last year of $23,020, renders his residence at 2012 Massachusetts Avenue NW. at an assessed value of $76,187, upon which he pays annually a real-estate tax of $1,142.80.

He rendered tangible personal property of the assessed value of $17,000, upon which he pays an annual tax of $255. He renders intangibles at an assessed value of $400,000, upon which he pays an annual tax of $2,000.

He renders two family automobiles, both being Packards, upon the two of which he pays an aggregate tax of only $2.55 per annum, plus $2 for license tags.

That is an astonishingly low tax on two Packard automobiles, I do not care whether they are old or new.

He pays an annual water rent of $32.33.

MARCY L. SPERRY

Mr. Marcy L. Sperry, president of the Gas Light Co., who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary last year of $16,920, renders no real estate.

He renders tangible property at the assessed value of $300, upon which he pays an annual tax of $4.50. He renders intangibles at the assessed value of $20,512, upon which he pays an annual tax of $102.56.

He pays an annual water rent of $49.67.

H. VINER

Mr. H. Viner, who is president of the Arcade Sunshine Co., who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary of $30,000, renders his residence at 3507 Massachusetts Avenue NW. and whatever other real estate he has at $47,837, upon which he pays an annual real estate tax of $717.56.

He renders tangible personal property of the assessed value of $2,500, upon which he pays an annual tax of $37.50. He renders intangibles at an assessed value of $816, upon which he pays an annual tax of $4.08.

He renders for taxes, three family automobiles, one Cadillac, one Buick, and one Chevrolet, upon the three of which he pays an aggregate tax of $26.92 per annum, plus $3 for the automobile license tags.

He pays an annual water rent of $29.25.

GEORGE W. WHITE

George W. White, president of the National Metropolitan Bank, who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary last year of $25,000, renders his residence at 2800 Upton Street NW. at an assessed value of $58,963, upon which he paid an annual real-estate tax of $884.46.

He renders tangible personal property at an assessed value of $2,000, upon which he pays an annual tax of $30. He renders intangible property at an assessed value of $11,788, upon which he pays an annual tax on the intangibles of $58.94.

He renders two family automobiles, one a Packard and one a Ford, upon the two of which he pays an aggregate tax of only $5.17 per annum, plus $2 for license tags, and he pays an annual water rent of $61.46.

EDWARD G. YONKER

Mr. Edward G. Yonker, president of the Sanitary Grocery Co., who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary last year of $74,660, renders on his residence at 5100 Thirty-ninth Street NW., at an assessed value of $75,800, upon which he paid an annual real-estate tax of $1,137.

He renders personal property at an assessed value of $8,500, upon which he paid an annual tax of $127.50. He renders intangible property at an assessed value of $213,064, upon which he pays an annual tax on intangibles of $1,065.32.

Gentlemen, one of the primary purposes of getting this evidence before you and the interested people of Washington is the fact that you will note that there are a great many people in Washington who have intangible property, and some of them are rendering it for taxes, and some are not, and from the reports that have been made to me by some reliable people here in Washington, if you check up you will find that there are many millions of dollars hidden away untaxed in the lock boxes in the banks in Washington, if you could ever find it, and it is going to take something more than just filing a mandamus suit to get it. Some new legislation must be passed to reach it.

So I am just giving you a fair cross-section of some of these cases, to show you that there are many instances where there is a large amount of intangible property owned.

Coming back to Mr. Yonker, he renders two family automobiles, one a Cadillac and one a Buick, upon the two of which he pays an annual aggregate tax of $38.54, and the annual water rent is $23.49.

MACK L. LANGFORD

Mr. Mack L. Langford, vice president of the Sanitary Grocery Co., who, the newspapers recently reported, drew a salary last year of $31,968, renders no real property, renders no tangible personal property, but renders intangibles of the assessed value of $32,464, which is less than 1 year's net income, upon which he pays an annual tax on intangibles of $112.32.

He renders two family automobiles, one a Chrysler and one a Dodge, upon the two of which he pays an aggregate tax of $22.19 per annum, plus $2 license tag fee.

He paid, you will note, $112.32 on $22,464 in intangibles, and that, plus the $22.19 that he pays on automobiles, is all of the tax that he pays in the District of Columbia, yet he has a net income of $31,968.

LAWRENCE B. CAMPBELL

Mr. Lawrence B. Campbell, who is treasurer of the National Press Building Corporation, renders no real-estate tax, renders tangible property of the assessed value of $184, upon which he pays a tax of $2.76, and that is the total tax that he pays in the District, $2.76 a year.

CHARLES B. DEGGS

Mr. Charles B. Degges, who is secretary of the Board of Education, renders his residence at 4419 Q Street NW., at an assessed value of $5,670, upon which he pays a real-estate tax of $85.06.

He renders no tangible personal property, no intangible property, one family car, an Oldsmobile, upon which he pays $9.15 tax, plus $1 for license tags, and he pays an annual water rent of $8.32.

Does any one know what is the salary of the secretary of the Board of Education?

Three thousand five hundred dollars, I think it is.

DR. EDGAR A. BOCOCK

Dr. Edgar A. Bocock, of Gallinger Hospital. With $7,500 salary, Dr. Edgar A. Bocock renders no real estate, no tangible personal property, but he renders intangibles, at an assessed value of $232, upon which he pays an annual tax of $1.16, and $1.16 is all Dr. Bocock, who draws a salary from the two Governments of $7,500 per year, pays the District.

G. C. Wilkinson is first assistant superintendent in charge of the colored schools, his salary being $6,000.

His residence, at 406 U Street NW., has an assessed value of $4,246, and he pays $63.70 per annum in real-estate taxes.

He renders no tangible property tax and no intangible.

He renders a family car, an Oldsmobile, upon which he pays an annual tax of $9.30.

He pays an annual water rent of $6.56.

WAYNE KENDRICK

Wayne Kendrick is connected with the Board of Accountancy. His office is in the Rush Building, and his residence is in Virginia, and he pays no taxes to the District.

DR. HENRY R. OSBORNE

Dr. Henry R. Osborne is president of the Board of District Dental Examiners.

His address is at 1726 I Street NW. He pays no taxes of any kind in the District of Columbia.

CHARLES E. SCHROM

Mr. Charles E. Schrom is the chief engineer of the fire department, with a salary of $8,000 a year.

On his residence at 1315 Maryland Avenue NE., which is assessed at $3,950, he pays an annual real-estate tax of $59.26.

He pays no tangible personal tax and no intangible tax.

He renders a family automobile, a Chevrolet, upon which he pays an annual tax of $3.60.

His annual water rent is $6.56.

ERNEST W. BROWN

Ernest W. Brown, Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police, $8,000 a year.

He pays no real-estate tax. He pays no tangible personal-property tax and no intangible tax.

He renders a Studebaker family car, upon which he pays an annual tax of $7.12.

He pays an annual water rent of $6.56.

MELVIN C. HAZEN

Here is our chairman of the board, Hon. Melvin C. Hazen, Commissioner.

His salary is $9,000.

On his residence, 1829 Sixteenth Street NW., the assessed value is $30,372, on which he pays an annual real-estate tax of $455.58.

On tangible personal property, with an assessed value of $148, he pays a tax of $2.22. Upon intangible property, assessed at $628, he pays a tax of $3.14.

On his family automobile, a Buick car, he pays an annual tax of $3.97, plus a $1 license-tax charge.

GEORGE E. ALLEN

Here is our friend, Hon. George E. Allen, Commissioner, with salary of $9,000.

He pays no real-estate tax. His tangible personal property is assessed at $300, upon which he pays $4.50. The intangible property is assessed at $5,068, upon which he pays $25.34.

E. BARRETT PRETTYMAN

Here is our friend, Hon. E. Barrett Prettyman, corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and his salary is $8,000. He resides in Maryland. Prettyman pays no real-estate tax, no personal tax, no tax of any kind to the District, but lives in Maryland.

HENRY I. QUINN

Mr. Henry I. Quinn, member of the Board of Education, District of Columbia, has his residence at No. 1507 Gallatin Street NW., assessed valuation $12,934—which in 1933 was assessed at $13,734—upon which he pays $194.02 taxes. He has tangible personal property of the assessed value of $1,100, upon which he pays $16.50 taxes. He has intangible property, assessed valuation $6,148, upon which he pays $30.74 taxes. He has two family automobiles, one a Dodge sedan and one a Dodge coupe, upon which he pays a total tax of $16.05 plus $2 for their two sets of license tags. He pays a water rental for his residence property of $12.97 per annum. He also owns the property at 3424 Fourteenth Street, assessed valuation $5,667, annual taxes $85, and pays $6.56 for annual water rental.

Mr. Speaker, at a later date I will show you exactly what all of the high-salaried officials of the District of Columbia pay in taxes, and it will surprise the membership of this Congress. If they lived anywhere else, they would get about one-third of the salary they receive here in the District of Columbia, and they would pay about three to five times as much taxes, if not more, than they pay here.

In another speech, which I am preparing, I intend to show you colleagues just how communism has crept into our public schools of Washington, and how an attempt was made between 1929 and 1934 to communize all of the schools of the United States through a commission that was appointed by the American Historical Association.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a great many inquiries have been made about the program for tomorrow and the next day. It has now been decided that the first bill to be taken up tomorrow will be the Federal housing amendment under a rule. We hope to conclude that bill tomorrow. The day after we will take up the so-called Smith anti-lobbying bill.

I make that statement for the benefit of the membership.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think we would be interested to know about what the gentleman is going to speak.

Mr. FERGUSON. I would like to address the House on the matter of flood control and legislation pending on that subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 26, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3699) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a center of music, and its contribution to the art of music for the past 50 years.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3424) to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3263. An act to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4);

H. R. 7690. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Albany, N. Y.; and

H. J. Res. 543. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 4086) for the relief of Ellis Duke, also known as Elias Duke, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 3263. An act to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4); to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 7690. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Albany, N. Y.; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H. J. Res. 543. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EMERGENCY RELIEF IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is unavoidably absent, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 543) making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia, which has just come over from the House of Representatives.

The Appropriations Committee of the Senate has met and has considered the joint resolution and has authorized me to report it with an amendment. I do not think there will be any objection to the joint resolution at all. It comes as a unanimous report from the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it may be passed at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is unusual to submit a request to amend a joint resolution without it first being read. I am not advised of the nature of the joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the joint resolution be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 543), as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to provide an additional amount for the purpose of affording relief to residents of the District of Columbia who are unemployed or otherwise in distress because of the existing emergency, to be expended by the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia by employment and direct relief, in the discretion of the Board of Commissioners and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board and without regard to the provisions of any other law, $350,000, to remain available until June 30, 1936, and to be payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inadvertently the House omitted certain words which are absolutely necessary in order to make the joint resolution conform to the rules of the House and the Senate. In line 11, after the word "law", there should be inserted the words "there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of." Those words were left out of the joint resolution in the House and the committee asks that the joint resolution be amended by the insertion of those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 11, after the word "law", it is proposed to insert the words "there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That to provide an additional amount for the purpose of affording relief to residents of the District of Columbia who are unemployed or otherwise in distress because of the existing emergency, to be expended by the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia by employment and direct relief, in the discretion of the Board of Commissioners and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board and without regard to the provisions of any other law, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $350,000, to remain available until June 30, 1936, and to be payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I submit a report (No. 1720) on the joint resolution and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Report No. 1720

The committee after consideration of House Joint Resolution No. 543, entitled "Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia", report the same to the Senate with an amendment incorporating the appropriation clause.

In justification of this appropriation the committee submits herewith the report submitted by Chairman BUCHANAN to the House of Representatives, which report most convincingly and accurately enumerates the reasons for the immediate passage of this resolution. The report referred to is as follows:

"The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred House Joint Resolution No. 543, entitled 'Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia', report the joint resolution without amendment and with a recommendation for its immediate consideration and passage.

"The amount proposed to be made available by the joint resolution is $350,000 payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia. The Budget estimate in the amount of $250,000, similarly payable, was submitted in House Document No. 425 of the present session.

"The sum appropriated for this purpose for the fiscal year 1936 in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act is $2,000,000. There will remain available on April 1 next from this and other sources approximately $125,000.

"The Budget estimate of $250,000, the committee was advised, would only be sufficient, when added to the $125,000 on hand, to provide for relief from April 1 to June 30, 1936, for the so-called unemployable cases on the relief rolls, leaving little, if any, to be expendable from District funds for those who are employable but not employed. Part of those classed as employables are so-called border-line cases, the character of the employment which they might be capable of being somewhat limited or the duration of their employability being in a measure speculative.

"The amount for emergency relief carried in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1937 as it passed the House is $1,506,020, the amount of the Budget estimate less certain reductions in administrative expenses. This amount, the committee was advised, would be sufficient to provide relief only for 'unemployables.'

"Under the amount of the Budget estimate of $250,000 for the remainder of the fiscal year 1936 the Board of Commissioners and the Board of Public Welfare have determined that if no greater sum is allowed relief first should be extended to the unemployables. This would also be the policy with reference to the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

"On the basis of most recent figures there are on relief of one kind or another in the District of Columbia, including work relief, a total of 23,000 cases, averaging three persons to a case, or a total of 70,000. Of this 23,000, approximately 14,000 cases are on work relief under the Works Progress Administration allotments and 9,000 cases are supported from funds furnished by the District of Columbia from its revenues.

"Allocations of funds by W. P. A. have been made to cover the fiscal year ending June 30 next, though it should in fairness be stated that those allotments do not contemplate the continuance in the spring and summer months of the full 14,000 cases; there will be some diminution of that class of relief. In this connection, however, it should be stated that the District of Columbia will undoubtedly be considered in the allocation of the $43,000,000 recently made available by the President for flood relief and to the extent the District may benefit from this allotment additional work relief would be provided.

"Of the 9,000 cases supported from District of Columbia revenues, about 4,000 are the so-called unemployables—persons who are unable to work if they have the opportunity—and 5,000 cases are employables on relief without work.

"On the basis of $250,000 additional, a situation would exist on April 1 next, whereby available funds would care for the 4,000 cases of unemployables, leaving most of the 5,000 cases of employables to find support either by obtaining work here or elsewhere or by finding relief from private sources of charity or local philanthropic agencies.

"The committee is not willing to require this abrupt termination of relief to these 5,000 cases without some notice and opportunity on behalf of the relief clients to obtain other methods of assistance. The Board of Commissioners desired $608,000 instead of the $250,000 which the Budget estimate provided for. This $608,000 would have carried the present status until July 1 next, when the same determination would have to be made unless the pending District of Columbia appropriation bill for 1937, when finally enacted, provides for a larger amount than the Budget estimate for 1937.

"The sum which is provided in the accompanying joint resolution is $350,000, which sum, together with the $125,000 on hand, will give a total of $475,000 for the period from April 1 to June 30 next. This will enable the local authorities to provide for the 'unemployables' and to taper off gradually the relief to the 'employables.'

"The problem presented was a most difficult one. With the $350,000 provided in this joint resolution, the total of funds for relief in the District of Columbia from Federal and local sources for the present fiscal year will reach $11,500,000. This includes allotments from F. E. R. A. and W. P. A. in addition to funds provided from District of Columbia revenues. On the basis of the amounts heretofore made available from Federal and District of Columbia revenues and the amount carried in the joint resolution, the District of Columbia will have furnished about 20 percent of the total and the Federal Government about 80 percent.

"It is realized that due to the presence of the National Capital there has been an influx of persons who thought greater possibilities of securing employment or opportunities of relief prevailed here than in other cities. No doubt there are many persons who would work if opportunity was presented also some who will not work so long as relief continues.

"A rather paradoxical situation exists in that Washington at the present time, from the standpoint of construction and retail trade, is perhaps more prosperous than at any time in its history, and yet there exists this very large charity roll. The community chest pledges have fallen from $2,444,000 in 1932 to $1,757,000 in 1936. With Government salaries restored to a 100 percent level and a near peak in Government employment with its consequently large bimonthly disbursement, there seems no logical reason why private charitable contributions should not also be at the highest level in the history of the city.

"The committee believes that unless curtailment is commenced, the large relief load may become a more or less permanent factor. The open season is approaching when many of the 'employables' here should find opportunity for reasonable work elsewhere, and, indeed, there must also be some employment in the city if it be diligently sought and accepted when offered.

"In raising the Budget estimate from $250,000 to $350,000 the committee has lengthened the period available to the Board of Commissioners and the Board of Public Welfare to work out the transition problem. It may be necessary to raise the present 1-year residence requirement to a longer period and to resort to more strict regulation to keep within the funds that are made available.

"The resolution should pass promptly. The 1st of April is not far distant and it is customary to pay the relief in cash for 2 weeks in advance. Administrative problems involved are difficult and the authorities should know as early as possible the amount which Congress is to make available."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the Vice President be authorized to sign the joint resolution if it shall be returned to the Senate during a time when the Senate is in recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTINUATION OF ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3424) to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes, which was, on page 2, after line 5, to insert:

SEC. 2. The corporation shall file with the President and with the Congress, in December of each year, a financial statement and a complete report as to the business of the corporation covering the preceding governmental fiscal year. This report shall include an itemized statement of the cost of operation, the total number of employees, and the names, salaries, and duties of those receiving compensation at the rate of more than $1,500 a year.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ROBINSON presented a letter from George C. Merkel, secretary-manager of the Pine Bluff (Ark.) Chamber of Commerce, relative to the imposition of proposed additional taxes on corporations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution adopted by the Maryland Yacht Club, Baltimore, Md., protesting against the enactment of the bill (H. R. 6203) to apply laws covering steam vessels of 15 gross tons and over propelled by internal-combustion engines, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 3597) construing the act approved August 14, 1935, entitled "An act to fix the hours of duty of postal employees, and for other purposes", which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the mayor and Council of the City of Baltimore, Md., favoring the enactment of legislation relating to the unemployment of youth, and the needs of students in high schools, vocational schools, and colleges, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of officers, members, and friends of Liberty Council, No. 16, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the deportation of criminals, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Croton, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to aid youth and the employment of youth, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by local no. 2 of Coopers' International Union, and the Association of Workers in Public Relief Agencies, both of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation providing social insurance to workers, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Warehousemen's Association of the Port of New York, N. Y., favoring continuation of the office of Federal Coordinator of Transportation, and the enactment of legislation regulating water carriers and wharfingers, also the reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Washington Heights branch of the New York State Association of Retail Meat Dealers, endorsing the so-called Robinson-Patman anti-price-discrimination bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of members of Colonial Council, No. 43, Daughters of America, of the Bronx, New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the deportation of criminals, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE BY WATER CARRIER

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram from the Associated Citrus Growers and Shippers of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAKELAND, FLA., March 25, 1936.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our board of directors, representing 50 percent of Florida's citrus industry through its 100 shipper members and representing over 6,000 growers who market through our shippers, also representing in direct grower membership over 1,000 growers, passed unanimously following resolution:

"We hereby vigorously protest passage of the Eastman water carrier bill, known as Senate bill 1632, because fostered by privileged railroad interests, that will result in generally higher transportation rates to Florida citrus growers in its so-called equalization purposes, which would tend to increase water-transportation rates and probably truck rates, with very doubtful lowering of rail rates in such equalization. Through March 21, 20,795 cars citrus moved by rail, 14,570 cars by boat, 7,449 cars by truck, or total 42,814 cars, averaging 391 boxes to car unit. Note that over 22,000 cars moved by boat and truck, or considerably over 50 percent of crop. This natural competitive advantage Florida holds over other citrus areas in economical transportation by boat and truck positively must not be interfered with under any circumstances; therefore we most earnestly request and fully expect from our Senators and Representatives most vigorous and continuous opposition to passage of this bill, and hereby authorize this resolution to be immediately sent to such representatives."

ASSOCIATED CITRUS GROWERS AND SHIPPERS OF FLORIDA,

By A. M. PRATT, Secretary-Manager.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 305) accepting the invitation of the Government of France to the United States to participate in the International Exposition of Paris—Art and Technique in Modern Life, to be held at Paris, France, in 1937, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1722) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9472) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain, and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1723) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (S. 2926) to authorize the Commissioner of Education in the Department of the Interior to conduct a study and disseminate his findings and recommendations regarding suitable aviation instruction courses for the public schools, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1724) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3167) to extend the provisions of certain laws relating to vocational education and civilian rehabilitation to the Territory of Alaska, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1725) thereon.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 3842) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the statehood of Wisconsin, and to assist in the celebration of the Wisconsin centennial during the year of 1936, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1726) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 4229. A bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of Bridgeport, Conn., as a city (Rept. No. 1727);

H. R. 10489. A bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding and settlement of the city of New Rochelle, N. Y. (Rept. No. 1729);

H. R. 11323. A bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the first settlement on Long Island, N. Y. (Rept. No. 1730); and

S. J. Res. 231. Joint resolution to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Swedes in Delaware (Rept. No. 1731).

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. COPELAND. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate bill 3500, to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes.

A report to accompany the bill will follow within a few days. The recommendation of the committee is not unanimous, and it is desired that in the report the views of the minority may be included with the majority recommendation, and it is the intention that sufficient time be afforded to give consideration to the minority views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

OPERATION OF FOREIGN AND AMERICAN SHIPS IN FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. COPELAND. From the Committee on Commerce I also report back certain amendments intended to be proposed to Senate Resolution 260, requesting certain information concerning the operation of foreign ships and of American ships engaged in foreign trade, submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] on March 19, 1936, and ask that they lie on the table for consideration when the resolution comes before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A FLOOD REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill which authorizes and empowers existing Federal agencies, including the Federal land banks, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, and the Resettlement Administration, to establish a flood-relief administration for the purpose of giving assistance to property owners who have lost their possessions in the recent flood catastrophe. This bill, if enacted, would authorize existing agencies which have relation to flood-relief projects to consolidate their efforts through a single agency, thus avoiding duplication of activity and making prompt and efficient action possible. I understand that there is now no one agency empowered to meet these needs and that the duties are distributed among various governmental units, more or less disconnected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 4357) relating to the authority of existing Federal agencies to establish a flood rehabilitation administration for the repair of damages caused by floods or other catastrophes was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DAVIS. In connection with the question of flood relief, I ask that certain telegrams I have received may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARRISBURG, PA., March 25, 1936.

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS,

Senate Office Building:

Resumption of normal pay rolls and restoration of commercial enterprises depend upon governmental action in substantial flood relief. Five thousand people were evacuated from their homes. Industries and business houses employing 10,000 were under 10 feet or more of water. Red Cross and other agencies rehabilitating individuals. Several hundred industries, distributors, and other concerns sustained serious capital losses. Assets were literally washed away in many instances. Survey now being made of actual loss. Need for long-term credit with reasonably easy security requirements imperative. Appreciate wire from you regarding any Federal plan or promise we might hold out to these businessmen on possibility of broadening regulations of R. F. C. and other direct lending agencies. This is entirely aside from flood control, which must have immediate attention. Know we can rely upon your leadership.

HARRISBURG CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
SAMUEL L. W. FLEMING, Jr., President.

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 26, 1936.

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS,

United States Senate:

Conforming with advice in this morning's papers, we will require a $50,000 loan to replace barges and land equipment destroyed by flood and ice. Kindly advise the proper procedure at earliest possible moment.

PITTSBURGH GRAVEL CO.,
South Eighth Street, Monongahela River.

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 25, 1936.

Senator J. J. DAVIS,

United States Senate:

Surveys made in the flooded areas reveal a most appalling loss of property. All of this is a capital loss for Pennsylvania. The cost of flood control is a small proportion of the loss involved in the present catastrophe. We urge you to use all your influence to obtain definite action of western Pennsylvania flood control at this session of Congress.

MARK S. JAMES,
Manager, Pittsburgh Commission for Industrial Expansion.

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 25, 1936.

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS,

Senate Office Building:

We urge your assistance in the restoration of our coal mines in Pittston area, which have been almost totally destroyed by flood waters of the Lackawanna and Susquehanna Rivers. The aid of Federal and State Governments to have our major industry pumped free of flood waters is vital. Seven thousand men are idle as a result and we cannot look forward to resumption of work for 1 year.

AMENDMENT OF MARINE CORPS PERSONNEL ACT

Mr. WALSH. I introduce, for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, a bill amending section 10 and repealing section 16 of the Marine Corps Personnel Act of May 29, 1934. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD in connection with the introduction of the bill a brief memorandum explaining its purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and, without objection, the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 4371) to amend section 10 and to repeal section 16 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes", approved May 29, 1934 (48 Stat. 811), and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The memorandum is as follows:

MEMORANDUM FOR NAVAL COMMITTEE

The effect of the amendments to section 10 of the Marine Corps Personnel act of May 29, 1934, as now drawn, provides:

(a) That until January 1, 1938, officers in the upper three-sevenths of the grades of first lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel will be eligible for consideration by selection boards without regard to length of service in grade; but that on and after that date all officers subject to selection will be required to serve 4 years in grade (3 years for first lieutenants) before becoming eligible for consideration by selection boards, as is now the case with officers of the line of the Navy.

(b) That no officer of the Marine Corps will become ineligible for consideration for selection or for promotion by reason of length of commissioned service or by age without having been at least once considered by a selection board. This makes eligible for promotion captains in the Marine Corps who have been placed on a promotion list, approved by the President, regardless of age.

(c) That officers of the Marine Corps of the grade of second lieutenant and above, except the Major General Commandant, the Assistant to the Major General Commandant, the heads of staff departments, and officers on eligible lists for appointment as head of a staff department, a maximum of eight officers, shall not serve on duty in Marine Corps Headquarters, Washington, D. C., more than 4 out of any 8 consecutive years unless the President shall determine that the public interests so require.

Section 2 repeals section 16 of the Marine Corps Personnel Act of May 29, 1934, which provides:

(a) For the involuntary retirement of not to exceed 11 majors and 6 lieutenant colonels in any one year who have failed of selection and who have completed the designated periods of service prescribed in the basic Navy selection law.

(b) For the removal of the restriction on pay on promotion of certain officers of all grades.

Section 3 provides:

(a) That no majors or lieutenant colonels may be involuntarily retired until June 30, 1936, and shall until that date retain their eligibility for selection.

(b) That a special selection board shall be convened immediately after the passage of this act for the purpose of considering the cases of eligible majors and lieutenant colonels; that this board shall select four lieutenant colonels and nine majors from among the officers in the respective grades now on the active list who held commissions in said grades on May 28, 1934.

ENFORCEMENT OF TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION

Mr. KING submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8368) to enforce the twenty-first amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGES IN CERTAIN SENATE SALARIES AND POSITIONS

Mr. POPE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 269), which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof, having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby directed to make the following changes in salaries and positions under supervision of the Secretary of the Senate, to wit:

Librarian: Strike out "librarian, $3,360" and insert "librarian, $4,320."

First assistant librarian and keeper of stationery: Strike out "first assistant librarian and keeper of stationery, at $3,130 each" and insert "first assistant librarian and keeper of stationery, at $4,320 each."

WAR DEBTS, DISARMAMENT, CURRENCY STABILIZATION, AND WORLD TRADE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 141) submitted by Mr. TYDINGS May 21, 1935, as follows:

Whereas the people of the United States, irrespective of political affiliations, have been desirous of promoting in every practical way the peace of the world and the economic and political welfare of other nations as well as their own, and have never failed to respond to the call of distress of other peoples and countries; and

Whereas the people of the United States are equally desirous of correcting any misapprehensions in this regard and to proclaim that no reason shall exist for questioning their desire to aid in every reasonable way the solution of the acute problems of the world arising from the war and depression; and

Whereas the present administration has frequently declared that national economic recovery and world economic recovery are inextricably bound together and that the principle of the good neighbor should characterize the relationship between the United States and all other nations; and

Whereas similar views have been held by Republican administrations and leading statesmen of the Republican Party, so that these broad views have the endorsement of both our major political parties; and

Whereas it is universally recognized that there is no problem existing today which is operating more directly, constantly, and powerfully to make understanding and good will between nations difficult, and therefore to postpone the return of economic well-being and durable world peace than the chronic problem of intergovernmental debts arising and resulting from the war; and

Whereas the next installment of allied war debts owing to the United States is due and payable on the 15th of June 1935, and no payment on these debts was made when the last installment came due on December 15, 1934, and the value and collectibility of these debts are becoming more and more jeopardized by the passing of time and the failure to devise and consummate a workable and mutually reasonable settlement thereof; and

Whereas such officials and leaders of European public opinion and action as Premier Flandin, of France; Economic and Finance Minister Schacht, of Germany; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer Chamberlain, of Great Britain, have within recent weeks given public indication of their recognition of the gravity of the problem created by the unsettled state of intergovernmental debts and of their desire for an equitable settlement that will promote and not retard world trade and that is in keeping with the present economic and financial conditions of the world; and

Whereas in June and also in December of 1934, in the exchange of notes on the allied-debt subject, both France and Great Britain did not repudiate them but frankly acknowledge the validity and legality of their respective war debts to the United States and expressed a desire and willingness to make a reasonable and feasible settlement of these debts; and

Whereas it is the desire of the people of the United States as indispensable both to economic recovery and to world peace to secure reduction of armaments by all nations and to inaugurate an immediate 5-year holiday in arms construction, in order to facilitate and insure rapid recovery from the ravages of the protracted depression and to prove good faith to one another in their treaty commitments to peace; and

Whereas general and drastic reduction of armaments is vital to both world peace and to economic recovery, the expenditures for armaments and war being by far the largest items in the budgets of the nations; and

Whereas responsible statesmen of all the large nations of the world have repeatedly expressed their willingness to join in a general universal movement for the reduction of armaments, but the disarmament conferences have, during the past few years, failed to reach any substantial accord as to reduction largely because of the ill will, fear, and resentments engendered, particularly in Europe, by the destructiveness of the last war and the treaties resulting therefrom; and

Whereas a strong indication of the sentiment in Great Britain has just been obtained by a popular referendum wherein the vote on the question of all-around drastic reduction of armaments by international agreement showed over 90 percent in favor of such reduction and agreement, a percentage that well represents the overwhelming public opinion of our land; and

Whereas a 5-year holiday in arms construction accompanied by gradual, drastic, and pro-rata reduction in arms, agreed to and carried out by the nations of the world, would be not only the sincerest guaranty of world peace but would also result in bringing national income and national expenditures within balance in all nations, would greatly reduce taxation, would vastly increase the buying power of all countries, and consequently would go far toward restoring to normal the benefits of the world trade, both for agriculture and for the industry; and

Whereas for the further advancement of world trade and therefore the prosperity of all peoples there should be a revival of confidence in the money units of the world, now so disordered and almost chaotic, by a working stabilization of international currencies under international agreement, such as would inspire confidence in businessmen and producers everywhere, and which would largely restore normal foreign trade, thus tending to relieve unemployment and to reflate our sadly deflated market value of commodities, securities, and real estate; and

Whereas the United States, by reason of its unprecedented contributions to the World War, its unselfish and equally unprecedented abstention from all the spoils of war at the peace table in harmony with the magnanimous pronouncements of President McKinley in 1898, and of President Wilson in 1917, namely, that it is our settled policy not to wage wars of aggression and not to accept the spoils of victory, is in a position to take the lead in a world-wide movement for the solution of these four acute international problems, (1) war debts, (2) disarmament, (3) stabilization of currencies, and (4) a sound revival of world trade, which now so harass the world and retard both economic recovery and world peace, and to the solution of which a world conference should be called to be held at the city of Washington at the earliest convenient and practicable time; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to advise such governments as he may deem appropriate that this Government desires at once to take up directly with them, with a view to entering into international agreements and treaties with other nations at a conference to be held in the city of Washington the following matters: The settlement of the intergovernmental debts, the means of obtaining a substantial curtailment in world armaments and a holiday in world armament construction, the means of securing a stabilization of the currency systems of the world, and the means for reviving world trade, all to such an extent and under such terms as may be agreed upon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the author of the resolution that it has been pending on the calendar for a long period of time and that it would be appropriate to refer it to the Committee on Finance. I make that motion. I see that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYNINGS] is not in the Chamber at the moment. If the motion shall be agreed to and the Senator from Maryland, upon his return, makes objection, I shall ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT AND CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 152) submitted by Mr. GORE June 15, 1935, as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller General is hereby directed to submit to the Senate a report showing the names, residence, and annual rate of compensation of all persons who have been appointed or employed under any act of Congress who receives compensation at a rate of $4,000 or more per annum and indicating those who are required by existing law to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who have not been so confirmed, and also those who are not required by existing law to be so confirmed; and further indicating in each case the date of the appointment or employment and under what act or by what authority such person was appointed or employed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OWNERSHIP OF GOLD STOCK IN THE TREASURY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a further resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 228) submitted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD February 6, 1936, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested to furnish the Senate with a formal opinion as to the ownership of and encumbrances on the gold stock of $10,182,372,580.54 reported on February 1, 1936, by the Treasury of the United States as among its assets, with particular reference to the status of the gold taken from the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am willing to have that done. I think we should have the information. It is very important. I hope the committee will take action very soon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I may state that it is my information that, under the law, the Attorney General has no authority to respond to the resolution. I ask to have printed in the Record in connection with my motion a memorandum which has been prepared at my request relating to this subject.

However, upon reconsideration, I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary instead of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Whatever committee will give consideration to the subject will be satisfactory to me. All we want is the information. I did not clearly understand the Senator's statement about the right of the Attorney General to render an opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated that, in my judgment, the Attorney General has no authority in law to render such an opinion as is called for, and I am going to ask to have published in connection with my remarks a memorandum relating to the subject which sets forth the statutory provisions and the constructions which have been placed on it from a time shortly after the office of Attorney General was created. I should like to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota, as a legal question is involved.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator if the memorandum shows who has construed or interpreted the law? As I understand, the memorandum purports to give a construction or interpretation of the statute.

Mr. ROBINSON. The memorandum does not relate to the opinion the Senator calls for in his resolution. It is confined to the power of the Attorney General to render such an opinion. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and that the memorandum referred to be printed in the Record in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

IN RE SENATE RESOLUTION 228

The authority of the Attorney General to render opinions is contained in sections 303 and 304 of title 5 of the United States Code. These sections read as follows:

"303. Opinions and advice of Attorney General; to President. The Attorney General shall give his advice and opinion upon questions of law, whenever required by the President" (R. S., sec. 354; Feb. 27, 1877, ch. 69, sec. 1, 19 Stat. 241).

"304. Same to heads of executive departments. The head of any executive department may require the opinion of the Attorney General on any questions of law arising in the administration of his department" (R. S., sec. 356).

In accordance with these provisions, which authorize the rendering of opinions to the President and the heads of departments only, it has been a well-recognized custom from the beginning that the Attorney General will refrain from giving opinions requested by other branches of the Government. The subject was treated comprehensively by Attorney General Mitchell in April 1932 in response to a request of the Senate for an opinion with respect to certain railroad mergers. The response of the Attorney General to that request emphasized the fact that Congress has not required, nor indeed authorized, the Attorney General to render opinions to Congress or either House, and that for over a hundred years the Attorneys General have deemed themselves precluded from giving such opinions. Attorney General Mitchell cited a number of instances of this kind dating back to an early statement of Attorney General Wirt in 1820 in response to a request of the House of Representatives. Continuing, Attorney General Mitchell stated:

"Under date of February 14, 1929, my immediate predecessor declined the request of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments for an opinion, and on June 3, 1930, I felt obliged to decline an opinion requested by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

"Congress has accepted this long-standing interpretation of the law and has never attempted by law to enlarge the powers or duties of the Attorney General so as to require him to give opinions to either House of Congress or to committees thereof. Having in mind the constitutional separation of the functions of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government, there has always been a serious question whether the principle of that separation would be violated by a statute attempting to make the Attorney General a legal adviser of the legislative branch, and as a matter of governmental policy the wisdom of constituting as legal adviser of either House of Congress an official of the executive department, who sits in the President's Cabinet and acts as his legal adviser, has always been open to doubt.

"When pending legislation affecting the Department of Justice has been referred to Attorneys General for comment or suggestion, it has been their practice to suggest such legal points as are pertinent and which ought to receive consideration by committees, but that practice has never properly involved any formal legal opinions from Attorneys General and has no resemblance to a request for an opinion as to the effect of an existing statute" (36 Op. Atty. Gen. 532).

Reasons of policy support this recognized practice. Except where required for administrative conduct, it would be inadvisable and inappropriate for the Attorney General, who is charged with the conduct of litigation for the Government, to render official opinions in a quasi-judicial capacity on matters which may become the subject of litigation.

INSTANCES ILLUSTRATING THE CONSISTENT VIEW OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL THAT THEY HAVE NO POWER TO RENDER OPINIONS TO EITHER HOUSE OF CONGRESS

Attorney General Wirt (1 Op. 335): "The Attorney General may give his advice and opinion upon questions of law only when required by the President or requested by the heads of the departments. It is not his duty to give official opinions to the House of Representatives."

Attorney General Brewster (18 Op. 87): "The authority of the Attorney General to give his official opinion is limited by the laws which create and define his office, and will not permit him to give advice at the call of either House of Congress, or of Congress itself, but only to the President or the head of an executive department." This was said in response to a request for the opinion of the Attorney General made by a resolution of the House of Representatives.

Attorney General Crittenden (5 Op. 561): The Attorney General declined to advise a committee of Congress as to the validity of a claim pending before the committee because "to answer the questions you have been pleased to propose does not fall within the limits of the duty, or legal power of the Attorney General, but would be a wide departure from his appointed sphere of action."

Attorney General Everts (12 Op. 544): In a communication to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs the Attorney General declined to give his opinion on a joint resolution pending before the committee. He said that "it has been uniformly considered that the powers and duties of the Attorney General were limited and defined by the statutes passed by Congress on the subject, and that any exercise of official action beyond the statutory authority conferred upon him was an unwarrantable assumption on his part * * *." That "it was not competent for the Attorney General to give opinions concerning any matters pending in Congress upon the request of either of the Houses or of any committee."

Attorney General Mitchell (36 Op. 532): The Attorney General (Apr. 25, 1932) felt obliged to decline to give an opinion in response to a Senate resolution on legal phases of the subject matter of the resolution, and cites an unbroken line of authority for more than a hundred years in support of his position.

PERSONNEL OF REGIONAL OFFICES OF HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 268) submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 24th instant, as follows:

Whereas the question of regional offices established by the Federal Home Loan Bank in addition to State offices is a question to be dealt with by the Congress; and

Whereas it is desired by the Senate to have information concerning such regional offices for the purpose of proposed legislation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Home Loan Bank Board furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable moment, the number of regional offices, the number of persons employed in each, the names and addresses of the various officials and employees of such offices, when they were appointed, the salary of each, the general duties of such offices, and for what reasons, if any, regional offices were established in States where there are State organizations or set-ups.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when this resolution was submitted a few days ago I asked that it go over under the rule, which was done. I should like to have an opportunity to examine the resolution and confer with the Senator from Tennessee about it. I hope he will not call it up at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator be willing to have me call it up a little later in the day, perhaps?

Mr. McNARY. I should not wish to make that promise.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator can do that. I shall be glad to let the resolution go over for the present.

Mr. McNARY. I always try to be fair—

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. McNARY. But I should not wish to give a promise unless I could keep it; and I ask the Senator to let the resolution go over at the present time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to do that at the request of the Senator; but I desire to amend the resolution slightly, and I ask the clerk at this point to read the amended form of the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Federal Home Loan Bank Board furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable moment, the number and location of regional offices, the number of persons employed in each, the names of the various officials and employees of such offices, the legal residence of each such official and employee at the date of their first employment by the corporation, the date of such first employment, the salary of each such official and employee, the general duties of such regional offices, and for what reasons, if any, regional offices were established in States where there are State offices or district offices; and the total monthly pay-roll expense, for the last available month, of State and regional offices in each State in which such regional offices are located; also the total pay-roll expense of the home office in Washington, by months, from January 1, 1935, to January 31, 1936, inclusive.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oregon will see that the resolution, as proposed to be amended, merely asks for a little fuller information than that requested by the original resolution. In view of the fact that questions are arising concerning these regional offices, I think we ought to have that information before the questions are presented.

Mr. McNARY. It seemed to me, from the reading of the amended resolution, that it is a complete substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is offered as a substitute, but it is substantially the same, except that it is a little fuller, and asks for a little more information than that requested in the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has a right to modify his own resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I so modify it, if I may.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, I am not complaining about that. I am simply making an inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator wishes to have the resolution go over for the day, however?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the modified resolution will be printed and temporarily passed over.

THE WILLARD HOTEL INCIDENT

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, on page 28 of the calendar there appears a resolution, Senate Resolution 240, submitted by myself. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The morning business is closed.

PEACE AND ITS RELATION TO PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR PITTMAN

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a radio address on the subject of Peace and Its Relation to Present-Day Problems, delivered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on Monday night, March 23, 1936, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I appreciate the honor and privilege of briefly discussing tonight the subject Peace and Its Relation to Present-Day Problems.

I assume that our people are most interested in the preservation of our own peace, and yet it is evident that our peace is inexorably affected by world conditions. I do not mean to assert that we cannot maintain peace in our country, even though the rest of the world should be at war, but every student of the history of peace and war realizes that the problem would become exceedingly difficult in such event. The world is not yet at war, and still we would be stupid, if not cowardly and unpatriotic, were we to bury our heads in the sands that we might not see things as they are. It serves us not to say there is no war when there is war. We deceive ourselves and those who rely upon us when we fanatically proclaim to our people that fear, greed, and ambition for power do not actuate governments today and that the spirit of conquest is dead. We do not stay war by ceremonial wallings, incantations, and protestations that there is peace.

The principle of national necessity has superseded and destroyed international law and treaty rights. The so-called national right by force to expand, to possess all necessary raw materials, to increase commerce, to establish and maintain racial culture and pet principles of government in the far places of the earth, to have the highest place in the sun, without regard to the rights of others, is today the most powerful influence in the world. This is the militaristic principle under which conquest is justified. This is the principle under which sacred treaties for peace are arbitrarily violated. This is the principle upon which is based the dictum that might makes right. Wars through the ages have been waged in support of this principle. War is now being waged to obtain the privileges asserted under such principle. Further conquests and expansions under this principle are even now being planned by various governments, and undoubtedly will be carried out with military force unless it is within the determination and power of the governments of the world to collectively stop it. Aye, there's the rub.

Is it the determination of the governments of the world to denounce such principle and prevent its barbaric use? Obviously, the weak nations fear conquest, but they have not the physical power to successfully resist it. How about the powerful nations? History answers this question. In 1919 the League of Nations was created and organized. It had for its purpose the prevention of wars, if possible, and the quick ending of those wars that do arise, by the use of and through collective action of governments. The Covenant of the League of Nations prohibited acts of aggression and provided adequate means for the amicable determination of international controversies. Back of all this force was provided in the form of sanctions, or boycotts, ostracism, and, if necessary, even armies and navies, to compel obedience to the adjudication of the League under the covenants. It was hoped that international controversies, like national controversies, could be justly adjudicated and settled without resort to war.

It seemed at the time to be a reasonable proposition. We proudly boasted of our high civilization, our philosophy, and our enlightenment, and the Christian spirit that moved all civilized people. We realized that war accomplishes nothing but destruction and has no place in this civilization.

It pains me to say anything derogatory to the League of Nations. It had the highest purpose, and its influence has been good. It is our duty, however, to learn and speak the truth. Nothing is accomplished through ignorance, deception, and cowardice.

It is our duty to frankly analyze the results of collective action of governments. What has this collective action accomplished? What hope does it offer to us for peace in the future? The League of Nations has successfully settled a number of minor international controversies that might have led to war, but so far it has utterly failed in taking sufficient action to enforce its decrees against powerful governments. I need only refer to a few of such outstanding failures. The Covenant of the League prohibited military alliances on the part of its members, and yet we know that there are military alliances in Europe and Asia by those who are members of the League of Nations. You cannot serve two masters. You cannot be in an alliance in the League and in an alliance outside of the League.

The Assembly of the League of Nations, represented by 42 governments, solemnly and positively determined and declared that Japan was an aggressor against China in Manchuria. Japan and China were both members of the League at that time and voluntarily submitted their controversies to adjudication by the League. Japan treated the decree of the League with contempt and continued the conquest of Manchuria. The sovereignty of China has been ousted from Manchuria, and yet the League has ever since remained silent and has taken no further action.

The League declared Italy aggressor against Ethiopia and demanded that Italy cease hostilities. Italy openly challenged the decree and continued its war against Ethiopia. And then the League declared its intention to use all its powers to punish the aggressor and stop this war. It imposed upon Italy economic sanctions. These sanctions being ineffective, the League threatened to place an embargo upon the shipment of oil to Italy. Italy threatened war if an embargo were established. The League did not place an embargo upon oil, nor has it done anything further toward the enforcement of its decree.

I am not passing upon the question as to whether the action of the League in any case was right or wrong. I cite the facts so that the effectiveness of collective action for peace may be intelligently weighed. I fully realize the difficulties in which the League has existed and acted. It never was a world league. It could not be unless the defeated powers had been invited to and had become members of the League. These powers had rights to adjudicate as well as other governments. They had the right to be in the League and there discuss the reasonableness of the terms of peace imposed upon them and the justice of their demands for modification of such treaties of peace.

Whilst many governments are members of the League, there are but few that possess military power. These great governments have their age-long enemies and are therefore imbued with hatred and inherent fear. Lacking confidence in the physical power of the League to protect them, they have sought and made alliances. It is hardly to be expected that they will lend military aid to the enforcement of the League's decrees as against a military ally. In the circumstances it is probably natural that governments should have more confidence in their allies than they have in the League of Nations for the ultimate protection of their nationals and their rights. It is true that many members of the League will take upon themselves the burden of imposing sanctions upon a determined aggressor, but few of these members will go to war to punish the aggressor and enforce the decrees of the League. And yet it is obvious that unless sufficient force is used—even to armed force—and is exerted to compel obedience to the decrees of the League, that then such decrees are not only futile but are deceptive practices against the weaker nations. This is the chief weakness of the League of Nations.

Great Britain did not know what members of the League would stand by her in the event she was attacked by Italy on account of the sanctions. European and Asiatic governments recognizing these weaknesses of the League have returned to the former policy of balance of power and military alliances.

Witness the result of the Nine Power Treaty on China, adopted at the great convention in Washington in 1922: The United States, Belgium, Great Britain, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal solemnly agreed, in written treaty, that—

"The contracting powers, other than China, agree:

"1. To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China.

"2. To provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government . . ."

Japan has deliberately and ruthlessly violated this treaty, as well as the Covenant of the League of Nations, and yet Japan ridicules the Nine Power Treaty and goes on with its plans of conquest without interference or even condemnation, save the protest of our Government and the judgment of the League of Nations that Japan is an aggressor and has violated the Covenant of the League of Nations. That's all!

Every effort for substantial limitation of armaments has failed. Our Government initiated the movement for the limitation of naval armaments at the Washington Conference in 1921 and 1922. We can never forget the magnificent gesture of our Government when our distinguished Secretary of State, upon the opening of that solemn meeting, voluntarily proposed that we destroy seven of our new battleships constructed and in process of construction. We destroyed our battleships, while other governments destroyed some old ships and many blue prints. The battleship was our chief naval weapon, but how did other governments respond to our courageous acts?

France contended that the submarine was the logical defense against threatening battleships, while Great Britain asserted that the cruiser was the best defense against submarines. So submarines and 10,000-ton cruisers were not limited. France would not stand for the limitation of airplanes and poisonous gases because Germany was prepared, so she contended, to provide quickly large quantities of these weapons of war with her peacetime factories. So airplanes and poisonous gases were not limited.

Well, it would appear to a reasonable person that we had made sufficient sacrifices of our national defense for the cause of world peace. Not so! Japan insisted that we should agree not to further fortify Guam, the Philippine Islands, and our other possessions in the western Pacific, and we surrendered in the name of peace. We have continued our efforts for the limitation of naval armaments, but they have all failed.

Great Britain and Japan have each just provided the largest appropriations for their navies, air forces, and armies made available since the World War. Germany is restoring her powerful navy with incomparable speed and skill. Other European governments are following these examples with every resource they can command. Today Europe is an armed camp, living in an atmosphere of hatred and fear, nervously waiting and listening for the sound of the shot that will precipitate Europe and Asia into the bloodiest catastrophe that the world has ever suffered.

We pity these unfortunate peoples. It is hard for us to understand their situation. We have no such conditions in this hemisphere. In Europe and Asia there are many races living in congested areas and in close contact, speaking different languages, having different customs, and suffering from distrust and the inherent fear of conquests such as have been visited upon their countries time and again throughout the ages.

And these are some of the causes which make for war and obstruct collective action for peace, and, yet all hope has not failed. Whilst the situation is exceedingly grave, yet strong influences are being sincerely and powerfully exerted to prevent immediate war while readjustments of rights are undertaken and a broadened and a more influential league of Europe is created and organized. Every intelligent, rational, human being prays God that this great work may receive its highest fulfillment.

What is our duty in this grave emergency? What can we do for the cause of world peace? What can we do to preserve our own peace, even though Europe and Asia become involved in war? In my humble opinion there is little, if anything, we may successfully do at this time in aid of the settlement of the present European controversy. We refused to join the League of Nations, and a majority of our people, I believe, are still opposed to such involvement upon the part of our Government.

Experience has conclusively proven that force—supreme force alone—can insure the enforcement of any decree whether it be by a national or international court. We cannot, therefore, afford to interfere with foreign controversies that threaten war unless we are prepared and determined, at the time, to use our military forces in defense of our acts, which acts may be construed as acts of war. Our Government will not send its military forces to Europe in aid of the enforcement of the decrees of the League of Nations or any other league or alliance, even though that be the only way to punish a guilty aggressor and prevent or stop war. We may do many things that will eliminate causes that, in the past, have tended to involve us in foreign wars, but we must not blind ourselves to the fact that when war insanity spreads over the earth there is nothing that can guarantee our peace.

We have enacted laws providing for the licensing of the manufacturers of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and have prohibited the exportation of such materials to belligerent countries. We have prohibited the granting of loans or the extending of credit to belligerent governments. We have regulated strictly the use of our ports by vessels of belligerents, and have taken steps to prevent our citizens from traveling upon the vessels of belligerent countries. This is the furthest advance ever made by any government in its efforts to protect its neutrality and escape the dangers of war.

There were those who favored extending such embargo to all materials and exports above the normal peacetime exports to such belligerent countries. This provision was bitterly fought. It was contended that it would be uselessly placing a destructive burden upon our farms, industries, and labor; that other countries would supply such materials and our foreign markets would be permanently destroyed; that it was inhuman to refuse to supply the innocent, civilian populations of warring countries with foodstuffs and clothing.

It was again called to the attention of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, which had such legislation under consideration, that during the World War every government, including our own Government, declared everything contraband of war, or, in other words, an illegal shipment that might be captured, even including foodstuffs; that, therefore, we would not escape the danger by exporting the normal quantity of such goods rather than the amount required by the demand.

On the other hand, it was strongly contended that it was better that we do not export anything to warring countries rather than that we should be dragged into foreign wars.

The controversy was maintained sincerely and ably upon both sides. It was evident, therefore, that if we wished any legislation at all it was necessary that we compromise, and, therefore, such provision was eliminated from the law.

What more may we do? We are not a member of the League of Nations, and we have no alliances. If we are attacked, then we must defend ourselves. Those extreme pacifists in our country—and I speak of the honest, sincere people, and not the hired pacifists—who oppose the maintenance of our Army, our Navy, and our air forces conscientiously believe that no foreign powers will attack us. They still believe that justice and a Christian spirit actuate all governments. They hold tenaciously to the theory that if we will not fight and that if we convince all other governments that we will not fight that, then they will not fight us.

I deeply regret to be impelled to declare that, in my opinion, history and experience do not sustain such high and pacific ideals. Even in our own country, the most enlightened in the world, police forces equal in size to our Regular Army are unable to protect our own people against murders, kidnappings, robberies, and other vicious and low crimes. The only thing that prevents the bully, whether he be individual or government, from acts of violence is fear of punishment or defeat. To tell a bully that you will not fight inevitably results in a fight.

By virtue of our situation, surrounded as we are by two great oceans and having as neighbors friendly powers, we do not require a large Army, but our very extensive coast lines—the longest in the world—and the absolute necessity of the maintenance of the Panama Canal, so that our fleets may be rapidly joined in either ocean, makes it absolutely necessary that we provide adequate protection. We cannot disguise the fact that many governments in the world are jealous of us, and some of them hold for us an intense hatred and a desire to humiliate and punish us.

Broad oceans at one time offered us great protection, but today the Pacific, 7,000 miles across, is spanned by airplanes. Fleets move more rapidly, and destruction by bombs and poisonous gases hurled from the air is more difficult to protect against. Many of our ships and our airplanes are antiquated and obsolete, while other governments have modern instruments of warfare and are increasing these instruments as rapidly as it is humanly possible. Let our Navy and our air fleet sink into obsolescence, and we invite attack upon our coast with the destruction of the lives of our people.

The only other step that we can take at the present time to protect our peace is to provide and maintain naval and air forces equal to those of any country in the world.

AFTER THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION, WHAT NEXT?—ADDRESS BY SENATOR TRUMAN

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, on March 20 instant, at Schenectady, N. Y., over the radio, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] delivered a very able address entitled, "After the Agricultural Adjustment Act, What Next?" I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have been asked to talk on a subject in which I am vitally interested: The farmer, and what after the Agricultural Adjustment Administration?

Agriculture is a basic industry. Things we eat and wear come from the soil, and there is no place else to get them. Up until a hundred years ago famines were not unusual, and even as late as 10 years ago famines in India and China have taken place.

Our invention of machinery has made starvation impossible in America, but the adjustment of price between what the farmer buys and what he sells is the problem now facing us.

This country has always been a producer of surplus farm products. We have been exporters of grain, cotton, and meat. This situation has been responsible for the farmer's market. He sells on a world market. He buys on a closed market. His machinery, his clothing, and everything he buys is on a price fixed by monopoly. Even the world market for his surplus products has been to some extent taken away because the world could not sell to us. After the war we suddenly became a creditor nation and at the same time an exporter of so much foodstuffs and manufactured articles that the purchasing nations could no longer pay for our products. This left the farmer with enormous surpluses and no market.

The farmer was put into the depression in 1921 and no effort was ever made to bring him out until the creation of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. That was an effort to limit production to the point of consumption, just as our manufacturers limit production to what they can sell.

The processing taxes were intended to balance the farmer's budget, to afford him a means of meeting high prices for things he buys. By limiting production, prices to farmers have risen to somewhere near a reasonable basis.

The Supreme Court, however, has decided that agriculture is not a national and interstate business but is one that the States must regulate. In order to meet that interpretation of the law and to maintain the ground gained by the farmer, the Soil Conservation Act was passed, the idea behind that act being that States will cooperate with the National Government in the regulation of farm production; that land not economically fitted for production will be taken over by the Government and not used for production; that the soil will be conserved by rotation and fertilization. Production will thus be made to meet a home market and a real agricultural policy for the country will be established. We must have such a policy, as we have a foreign policy and a military policy.

This situation has been made necessary by our mutton-headed tariff policy under past administrations, which ruined our foreign markets and has almost bankrupted agriculture. It is my opinion that State cooperation, cooperation of the farmers, and the establishment of a real agricultural policy will solve a most difficult problem. Therefore I can't see how the farmer can do anything else but support Franklin D. Roosevelt and reelect him, so that this agricultural policy may be carried to a successful conclusion.

The United States Department of Agriculture says in a summary of the provisions of the new Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act that it provides for conservation and improvement of soil resources, reestablishment and maintenance of farm income, assurance of adequate supplies of food and fiber for consumers, and the protection of rivers and harbors against the effects of soil erosion.

Temporary Federal aid in the form of grants direct to individual farmers to assist voluntary action for these purposes is authorized until State plans are ready or until January 1, 1938, after which grants will be made only to States upon the submission of State programs and their approval by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with provisions of the act. The act authorizes an annual appropriation of not more than $500,000,000. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1937 is $440,000,000, which with $30,000,000 from tariff collections makes a total of $470,000,000.

The objectives under the declared policy of the act include: (1) Preservation and improvement of soil fertility; (2) promotion of the economic use and conservation of land; (3) cutting down the wasteful and unscientific use of national soil resources; (4) protection of rivers and harbors against the results of soil erosion.

for the purpose of aiding flood control and maintaining navigability; (5) reestablishment at as rapid a rate as the Secretary of Agriculture determines to be practicable and in the general public interest of the ratio between purchasing power of the net income per person on farms and that of the income per person not on farms which prevailed during the 5-year period August 1909 to July 1914, inclusive, and the maintenance of this ratio.

Under the temporary plan of Federal aid, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make payments to producers measured by (1) their treatment or use of land for soil restoration, conservation, or the prevention of soil erosion; (2) changes in the use of their land; (3) a percentage of their normal production of one or more designated commodities equal to the normal national percentage required for domestic consumption. Payments may be made on any one or any combination of these bases of measurement. Productivity of the land affected is to be taken into consideration in making payments for changes in use and soil conservation.

Under the permanent State-aid plan the Secretary is required, on or before November 1 of each year, commencing in 1937, to apportion funds available for State plans for the next calendar year. In determining the amount to be apportioned to each State, the Secretary is required to take into consideration for each State the acreage and value of the major soil depleting and major export crops produced during a representative period and the acreage and productivity of land devoted to agricultural production during a representative period. During the temporary Federal-aid period, apportionment of funds for carrying out State plans for each of the years 1936 and 1937 may be made at any time during those years.

The act authorizes the Secretary, in carrying out its provisions during the temporary period of Federal aid, to utilize county and community committees of agricultural producers as well as the Agricultural Extension Service and other agencies such as he finds will assist in accomplishing the purposes of the act and provides for their participation also in the State-aid plan.

State plans, in order to conform to specifications set forth in the act, must include (1) provisions for a State agency to administer the plan authorized by the State and either designated or approved by the Secretary; (2) provisions for such methods of administration and participation by county and community committees or associations of producers organized for the purpose as the Secretary finds necessary for effective administration of the plan; and (3) provisions for submitting such reports as the Secretary finds necessary to assure that the State plans are being carried out. One-fourth of the money apportioned to each State is payable to the State following approval of the State plan. The remainder is to be paid in installments according to provisions of the State plan.

Payment of installments would cease in the case of failure of a State to carry out the terms of its plan, funds apportioned to that State would remain available for the general purposes of the act. Prior to January 1, 1938, the Secretary is authorized to make use of cooperative assistance by the Agricultural Extension Service, or other approved State agencies. After this period, the State administrative agency will be one authorized by the State, whether designated by the Secretary or approved by him after designation by the State.

The Secretary is required to protect the interests of tenants and sharecroppers and small producers. Tenants and sharecroppers are specifically included as agricultural producers under the authorization empowering the Secretary to make payments to carry out the purposes of the act.

In the provisions relating to farm income, the act recognizes the right of agriculture to keep pace with the rate of progress made by the Nation as a whole. The 1909-14 balance between agricultural and nonagricultural living standards, as measured by the relative purchasing power of net incomes of persons on farms and incomes of persons not on farms, is the objective in reestablishing and maintaining farm income.

In carrying out the provisions of the act with regard to reestablishing and maintaining the ratio of purchasing power of farm income, the Secretary is required to give due regard to the maintenance of a continuous and stable supply of agricultural commodities adequate to meet consumer demand at prices fair to both consumers and producers.

The act prohibits the use of the powers relating to farm income for the purpose of discouraging the production of supplies of foods and fibers sufficient to maintain normal domestic human consumption. The Secretary is directed to determine normal domestic human consumption from the records of the years 1920 to 1929, inclusive, taking into consideration increased population, quantities of any commodity forced into domestic consumption by decline in exports, current trends in domestic consumption and exports of particular commodities, and the quantities of substitutes available for domestic consumption within any general class of food commodities.

The provision requiring the Secretary to take into consideration the quantity of any commodity forced into domestic consumption by decline in exports recognizes that the domestic market took during the years 1920 to 1929, at some price, whatever livestock products, such as pork, were offered, placing producers at a price disadvantage when large supplies were forced on the market. The provision regarding substitutes recognizes that consumers may and do substitute one farm commodity for another in their diet, and that allowance should be made for such substitutions.

Use of funds for expansion of domestic and foreign markets or for seeking new or additional markets for agricultural commodities or for the removal or disposition of surpluses is authorized whenever the Secretary finds that it would tend to carry out the provisions of the act with respect to farm income or would tend to provide for and maintain a continuous and stable supply of agricultural commodities adequate to meet consumer demand at prices fair both to consumers and producers.

The act authorizes the Secretary to conduct surveys, investigations, and research and make public the information he deems necessary to carry out its provisions. In addition to the United States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii and the possession Puerto Rico come under the application of the act.

The administration is making an honest effort to create a definite policy for agriculture, one which will place the farmer on a level with other industries. For the first time in our history we are discovering that the producer of food and fiber is a vital and essential part of our population, and that his interests and welfare are as important as the banker's, the manufacturer's, and the building contractor's. The welfare of the country demands that this policy should be carried to a successful conclusion, and I am sure the country as a whole will see that it is.

ELIMINATION OF PROFIT FROM WAR—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CONNALLY

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject Take the Profit Out of War, delivered by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], March 23, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAKE THE PROFIT OUT OF WAR

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, war and peace are of transcending importance to the peoples of the world. They are matters of life and death. The continent of Europe is at this moment disturbed by the threat that engines of destruction may again be set in motion and a torrent of blood and agony and misery may sweep down on a luckless and unhappy people. In the distant Orient armies are marching and drums are beating. The American people covet no part of such a grim and cruel tragedy. They are devoted to the ideals of peace. They want to live in the spirit of the good neighbor. We are not dominated by the spirit of a conqueror. Liberated and independent Cuba and the Philippine Commonwealth are our witnesses. In spite of the pacific attitude of our people the United States has in the past been forced to draw the sword. While we pray God that we may never again be summoned to the crimson bar of a military court, our national interests and security require that we be prepared to assert and maintain our rights when violated or our security when threatened.

The profit element in war has come to be regarded by a great proportion of our people as one of the motives of greedy interests to agitate and foment causes that may provoke armed conflict. History reveals that even in America in times of national peril there have been those who profited unduly from the misfortunes of our countrymen. Even in the long and bitter struggle of the Revolution profiteers and contractors grew rich. From the camp where his ragged soldiers were assailed by hunger and the biting blasts of winter, General Washington bitterly protested against their extortions. In the War between the States favored interests reaped huge financial rewards while armies staggered in the throes of death. Even in the Spanish-American War, though of slight duration and of modest military operations, embalmed beef and other scandals are yet vividly remembered. In the World War, while there was little of scandal or criminality revealed in war contracts, it is true that inordinately high profits were garnered by those dealing in munitions and supplies.

The American people want unfair profits taken out of war, both to deter incitement to war and to obviate in time of crisis unconscionable profits to a few at the expense of the many.

At the last session of Congress the House passed what is known as the McSwain bill, having for its purpose the drafting of industry and the limitation of profits. This legislation is now pending before the Finance Committee of the Senate. During the recess of Congress in the summer and fall of 1935 the tax experts of Congress and the Treasury Department made an exhaustive study of the McSwain bill and the bill offered by the Munitions Committee as a substitute therefor.

As chairman of a subcommittee of the Finance Committee, it has been my duty to conduct an examination and report to the full committee with respect to these measures. The subcommittee has held hearings and has surveyed the measures in the light of expert advice. The difficulty does not lie in any conflict of purpose. The subject is one of such far-reaching magnitude and of such a complex and intricate nature that it requires the most careful and detailed study to devise a measure which will accomplish the wholesome end of taking the profit out of war and yet will not cripple or hamper the Government's efforts in time of war nor impair its revenues.

At the very outset arises the question whether the profit motive should be entirely taken away from corporations and individuals. On the one hand, it is urged that in time of war neither individuals or corporations should be entitled to any profit. On the other hand, it is argued that if such a motive is entirely removed there will be little incentive for the expansion of facilities to manufacture munitions and supplies when we may be in need of them to prosecute the war. It is also proposed that in time of war authority shall be given to the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, to draft all industries and operate the same under Government supervision. This involves activities of the most gigantic and widespread character and administrative details staggering in their proportions.

Another aspect is the question of Government revenue and whether such legislation should be designed to produce the maximum amount of revenue or whether its chief purpose should be its social and economic effects.

These important questions of policy are being submitted by the subcommittee to the full membership of the Finance Committee of the Senate in order that it may determine such major policies in advance of drafting the details and particular provisions of the legislation.

It is our earnest desire that in time of war industry may be conscripted for war service just as the manpower of the Nation of military age is called from home for service on the battlefield. We propose that prices of war materials and commodities may be frozen as nearly as possible at a level normal prior to the declaration of war. We propose the levying of taxation at such a rate as will capture excess war profits to aid in financing the war and to prevent unconscionable advantage to those not in the armed forces. It is also our purpose that upon the declaration of war the Government may commandeer material resources, industrial organizations, public utilities, and other necessary and useful facilities required for the successful and early termination of the war, and to control and regulate the same for the duration of the crisis.

According to my view, in time of war no corporation or industrial concern should be entitled to receive a profit of more than 4 percent upon its invested capital, and that individuals engaged in the conduct of financial, commercial, industrial, and manufacturing enterprises should not be permitted to receive compensation for their services at a higher rate of pay than is received by officers or men in the Army of comparable station or responsibility. Factories and plants and industrial enterprises should be subject to the same motives of patriotism and service to country as are the men who are called to the colors. Corporations should be made to feel in time of war, at least, that they have a soul. Dollars and machines and the brick and stone and concrete of great industrial enterprises should be made to serve in time of war the country whose flag protects them and gives them security no less than the private citizen who must lay down the implements of his toil or leave the books and activities of his profession or calling to grasp in his hands the weapons of war and to march forth to meet the enemy and perhaps to die.

The American Legion has rendered to America a distinct and outstanding service in advocating and making a part of its program the plan to take the profit out of war. The veterans of the Legion have seen war. They know something of its horrors and miseries. They have seen their comrades in the shock of the charge spill their blood on foreign soil. At the country's call they abandoned their peacetime occupations. Returning from the battlefields of Europe they brought back the flag wrapped in a new and gleaming luster. On battlefields where continental armies had marched and struggled for 2,000 years they blazed a glorious pathway for American arms. They returned to find that many of those who remained at home had profited and prospered while they had sacrificed and suffered. The veterans of the World War are now determined that if in the future out of the tangled web of international complications America should be forced reluctantly to draw the sword industries and profits and dollars and machines and factories shall all alike be called to the colors, along with the manpower of the Nation, and that with one spirit and with a united front the wealth, the resources, and the money of America shall stand in battle ranks by the side of the soldiery of the Nation—men and money shall be marshaled in an invincible army to win victory for the flag and to share equally in the sacrifices of war.

PROBLEMS OF REEMPLOYMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HATCH

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and informative address on the subject Meeting the Problems of Reemployment, delivered over the radio on the evening of March 24 by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEETING THE PROBLEMS OF REEMPLOYMENT

Much has been written and much is being said concerning the problems of relief and unemployment. Tonight I refer more particularly to how we are meeting the problem of reemployment. Obviously, there is a difference in the terms "unemployment" and "reemployment", even as there is a difference in the problems.

Unemployment brings the thought of men out of work, of men in desperate straits and circumstances.

Many persons view our perplexing conditions solely from such standpoint. They assert the problem is merely a matter of private charity, to be assisted and supplemented perhaps by aid from State and Federal agencies.

Others who view the problem from somewhat the same angle contend a Government subsidy or system of dole is the solution. Those who think of charity or of a dole are not thinking in terms of reemployment. However, if they are correct in their thinking, the problem can be met readily. Americans have ever been noted for their generosity in times of distress and want. The dole can be arranged. Through its taxing powers, the Government can raise funds sufficient to insure a system of dole.

Reemployment admits that temporary treatment has required direct relief, and also that there will always be cases which are for the usual channels of charity. Reemployment contemplates and thinks of sending millions of men marching back to useful, suitable employment at adequate, gainful wages, to employment which shall provide a sense of security, permanency, and stability. Reemployment urges the fundamental American philosophy of opportunity to work for all who have the will to work. Mark you, this American philosophy of reemployment concerns those who have the will to work. It does not include the indolent or shiftless, who are unemployed from choice. With rapidly increasing activity in every line of business, the unemployed must cooperate and help solve this vexatious problem by exerting every possible effort to secure private employment. For their own welfare and the welfare of the country as a whole, this must be done.

To so order our economic life to make the principle of reemployment as thus outlined a reality is no minor task. It requires our best thought and attention. It is the problem of reemployment as distinguished from the problem of relief and unemployment.

Many new remedies and thoughts are suggested, but I shall content myself in mentioning only a few of what seem to me to be fundamental factors. It must be remembered the problem with which we deal is not exactly new. It has plagued this country before. Even in the so-called boom period of great industrial expansion, of large incomes and swollen fortunes, many able, ambitious, industrious American citizens were unable to find work because there was no work for them to do.

In the spring of 1933 the battle lines were rather definitely established. Two fronts challenged. The methods of attack differed as the problems differed.

For the emergency, to care for the immediate needs of those in want and distress, plans for direct relief were laid and carried out quickly. But direct relief was never considered as an answer to the problem. It was and is temporary. It must not be permanent.

To meet the problem of unemployment, vigorous and aggressive measures along lines of reemployment were initiated and carried on. It is here we find the attack along lines which may seem old, but, nevertheless, the measures adopted recognize and deal with certain fundamental aspects of the problem, which must be met.

It was correctly understood that unemployment continued and successfully resisted efforts to reemploy, because the buying power of the Nation had completely dried up during the depression years. It seemed necessary, as it was necessary, to restore purchasing power to the people of America before any advance could be made. Business and industry could not reemploy without markets for the products of business and industry.

The greatest of all American markets, that of the American farmer, had dwindled to almost nothing in the spring of 1933. Agriculture, therefore, presented the first battleground. On that front a steady conflict was waged. Decidedly the trend of agriculture is upward.

In 1932, according to figures from the Department of Agriculture, the average net income of the American farmer was $244. That average has been increased nearly three times. In 1935 it was $630. Not enough yet, but decided progress has been made. The purchasing power of the farmer has been increased. He has again become a buyer. The armies of the unemployed were weakened; the troops of the reemployed were strengthened and men are marching back to work today as a result of the increased purchasing power of the farmer.

To advance business and industry, to increase productive activity, and to aid labor a direct offensive to increase the purchasing power of those who labor was commenced. The N. R. A. was a direct attack on low wages, long hours, child labor, sweatshop methods, and all such evils. But on the battlefield of N. R. A. reverses were met. N. R. A. is dead. Whether it was good or bad is not material at the moment, except to say that there was enough good within the purposes of N. R. A. to cause industry to retain many of its provisions.

In the current issue of Collier's Weekly this statement is made: "With the disappearance of N. R. A. child labor returned." Child labor was returned because child labor was cheaper. The forces of reemployment were repulsed when child labor returned. But notwithstanding the reverses the battle against low wages, long hours, child labor, and sweatshop methods will go on.

Another attack to increase production, to aid business and industry, and to restore purchasing power to labor was made through the public works building program. Through P. W. A. and W. P. A. great building projects have been undertaken and are being carried on today. Every section of our country is benefited directly and indirectly by the building program. Speaking in the Senate recently, Senator HAYDEN, of Arizona, illustrating some of the benefits of the building program, said:

"At least 70 percent of the money already spent for materials has gone directly into the pockets of hundreds of thousands of men called back to work in mines, mills, factories, and on transportation lines throughout the country.

"No one will dispute the fact that the Public Works Administration has been a potent factor in generally improved economic conditions."

The battle on this front continues. It is gaining power and strength each day. Here the forces of the unemployed today retreat before advancing troops of the reemployed.

Whether you agree or not, may I call your attention to another vigorous blow struck by the administration against the evils which helped to dry up the sources of purchasing and buying power in America. I refer to the policy which resulted in the reduction of the gold content of the dollar. Criticism from some sources has been leveled at this measure.

It takes no expert in monetary matters to know that money had become so abnormally high in value, it was one of the chief obstacles standing in the way of recovery and reemployment. In our well-known worship of the dollar, it took courage to assail the citadel of the money king. But the assault was made. It was successful.

Almost without exception, today it is acknowledged and conceded the administration's firm stand in reducing the gold content of the dollar has been a decided gain and advance on this front.

I mention only a few of the factors involved in this great effort toward reemployment and against the forces of unemployment. There are other elements of great importance. The National Reemployment Service directly attacks the problem of unemployment, and daily aids reemployment along substantial and constructive lines.

Unemployment insurance, old-age security, labor boards to handle industrial disputes, retirement acts, and humanitarian measures of similar nature and kind, are designed to aid in the war against unemployment, not only for the present but for the years to come.

In speaking of the problem and the various measures taken in connection with it I am not unmindful of certain figures and statistics which point to large numbers of men unemployed and on relief today. There is much controversy and conflict in opinion as to the estimates, but, regardless of whether they are correct or not, it seems to me the greater the number of unemployed the more vigorous must be our efforts to provide reemployment and to continue the fight on the causes and conditions which bring about unemployment.

Obviously the condition seems to require further intense study, the acquisition of all possible information, and the elimination of all incorrect details, if any exist. Along this line, I introduced a resolution in the Senate recently which provides for a comprehensive study, survey, and investigation of the entire problem of unemployment and relief. It seemed that such an investigation would be helpful in solving the problems of the moment; also that it should be helpful in shaping future course and policy.

I think Congress is charged with grave duty and responsibility here. Certainly it is charged with the duty of understanding the problem as thoroughly as possible.

Commenting on the need for data and information in connection with these problems, the New York Times in an editorial said, referring to unemployment and relief, "No one has yet accurately measured the problem." The resolution to which I refer seeks to measure the problem accurately.

But again referring to the problem of reemployment and the advances made, I must repeat that progress has been and is being made. According to the Secretary of Labor, "approximately 5,000,000 men and women who were without jobs in March 1933 have since been returned to work in private industry. More than 4,000,000 others have found work on P. W. A. construction projects, in C. C. C. camps, on State road work, and on P. W. A. jobs."

Even if we wish to disregard the 4,000,000 on public works, we must admit that 5,000,000 men going back to work in private industry is real progress. It means increased buying power.

Technological unemployment presents its serious problem. Here, indeed, lies a fundamental matter which must be met. In a recent study Dr. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, observes that not only must purchasing power be expanded, but he urges increased economies can be had through the use of the machine; wages need not be reduced, but prices must be reduced in order to provide more consumption in the low income-tax groups. Others urge the shorter day and the shorter week. Similar and other remedies are suggested. Certainly, here labor and industry must regard their cause as a common one. Purchases of tear gas, guns, and ammunition will not solve the problem.

Machinery must not be abandoned; but if it is used only to replace men and increase profits, those who find it a means of temporary gain will awaken to find that it has been the means of their own destruction. The machine must not be the master of man; man must remain the master of the machine. That which is designed to save human labor must not be allowed to destroy human beings.

Here, I repeat, we are reminded of the high duty and responsibility of business, labor, and industry to cooperate and work together for the advancement of the common welfare and good.

The thought of united effort and cooperation was suggested by the President in his recent message to Congress on unemployment and relief.

While increased purchasing power has resulted and has caused better markets and increased productive activity, and while men are marching back to work, we can well remember the President's plea for cooperation, for the battle is not yet finally won.

The President well said the problem is common to all. In this connection, may I recall his words:

"It is a problem to be faced, not merely by Congress and the Executive, not merely by the representatives of Government in the States and localities, but by all the American people."

ADMINISTRATIVE LAWMAKING—ADDRESS BY COL. O. R. M'GUIRE

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject Administrative Lawmaking, delivered by Col. O. R. McGuire, chairman of the committee on administrative law of the American Bar Association, on March 17, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow citizens, the late Theodore Roosevelt once said that "No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it. Obedience to the law is demanded as a right, not asked as a favor." The basic law in this country is the Constitution of the United States, which divided all of the power conferred in that document among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Federal Government. It gave to the legislative branch the exclusive duty and responsibility of making the laws within the limits of the powers conferred, either expressly or impliedly, on the Federal Government; it gave to the executive branch the duty of enforcing such laws; and it gave to the judicial branch the duty and responsibility for interpreting and applying the laws so made to concrete cases as they are brought from time to time before the courts. During the century and a half intervening since the adoption of the Constitution, we have had 21 amendments thereto, but none of them has made any change in its original division of governmental power.

However, such division is approximate and not absolute. Each of the three branches exercises, in practice, some of the power which is theoretically that of the other branches, and it is by virtue of this fact that we find the executive branch not only enforcing the law but making some of the law which it enforces. We refer to the law made by the executive branch as administrative law. Also the executive branch must interpret and apply the law to concrete cases and controversies as they arise in the administration of the Government, and it is this combination of legislative, executive, and judicial power in the hands of the Executive which has led to serious complaints within recent years, particularly in those instances where the administrative decisions on the law and the facts are not reviewable in a tribunal absolutely independent of the executive branch of the Government. Such complaint is made more pertinent by the fact that only the lower grades of Government employees are career men and women, appointed and promoted on the basis of merit, under the civil-service laws, while practically all of the chief administrative and many of the semijudicial positions of power and responsibility in our complex Government are filled on the basis of political service to the administration in power for the time being and that generally such chief administrative officers change with each change of administration.

Such a situation has come about during the course of many years. The Constitution imposes on the President the solemn and awful duty of seeing that the laws are enforced; but the President cannot personally administer and enforce all of the laws. He has a large force of subordinates in the executive branch of the Government to aid him; and they are not only located in Washington, at the seat of government, but they range the Asiatic plains in search of drought-resisting plants; they patrol the Bering Sea to protect the seal herds from extinction; they are stationed in the capitals and principal cities of the world; and they not only transport and deliver the mails but they collect the internal-revenue and customs taxes, search for violators of Federal laws, run the armed forces of the country, and perform countless other tasks. These men and women, wherever located, and whatever may be their duties, are controlled by means of rules and regulations issued by the President or by his chief advisers; that is, by administratively made law.

Such rules and regulations prescribing the duties of subordinates, filling in the interstices of the law, and directing what shall be the decision or action in various situations, likely to arise in the enforcement of the law, are known as administrative laws. The Congress did not undertake to determine in the statutes the details of administration, even in the early days, when governmental processes were comparatively simple. Likewise, it does not undertake to do so today. It is humanly impossible for any Congressman or Senator to sufficiently familiarize himself with all of the details of administration of the various laws to enable him to legislate with respect thereto, even if the constituents of such lawmakers did not impose on them many duties which have little, if anything, to do with lawmaking but, nevertheless, consume time and energy which could otherwise be devoted to studying proposed legislation.

Some delegation of lawmaking power to the executive branch of the Government is absolutely necessary—not only because it is impossible, in practice, for the Members of Congress to familiarize themselves sufficiently to legislate with respect to details of administration but because a degree of flexibility is essential in the administration of the law to meet changing conditions and circumstances. A statute descending into details permits of no discretion in its administration; and our great machinery of government cannot be run efficiently, economically, and fairly without some discretion in the officers and employees charged with the administration of the laws.

It is a fine point as to the amount of discretion which may be conferred by the Congress on the President in the administration of the law; that is, in the issuance of rules and regulations. The matter has been before the Supreme Court of the United States on several occasions, and such laws were uniformly upheld until the two recent judgments of that court in the Hot Oil and Schechter cases. These two cases arose under the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933. The Court held that this statute was unconstitutional in certain respects because it failed to prescribe a standard and declare a policy for the guidance and control of the orders and regulations issued or approved by the President under such statute. However, such rule is not impossible of observance by the Congress, and we may confidently expect that during the coming years the legislative branch will be careful to state a policy and prescribe a standard in the statutes for administratively made laws and that the courts will not be astute to find reasons for refusing to enforce the statutes.

The danger to American institutions of government does not lie so much in abstract questions as to whether a particular detail should have been stated by the Congress in a statute rather than in rules and regulations issued under the statute. The danger lies rather in the failure of our machinery of government to provide in all cases—not involving our foreign relations or the conduct of our armed forces—for a review of the law and the facts of any controversy with the administrative branch of the Government in a tribunal absolutely independent of the Executive. The citizen is not so much concerned whether the detail of the law has been enacted by the Congress or is contained in a rule or regulation issued by the administrative branch of the Government as he is in knowing that the law does not transcend the Constitution and that the facts of his claim or controversy with the United States are fairly and fully determined.

The American Bar Association, through its special committee on administrative law, and several Members of the Congress, have been engaged for a number of years in the study of this problem of our constitutional form of government in the twentieth century, and particularly with the devising of machinery which will enable any citizen to secure an independent review of both the law and the facts of his controversy with the administrative officials in a tribunal independent of the executive branch of the Government. This is the proposed Federal Administrative Court, as embodied in a bill introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress by Senator LOGAN, of Kentucky. The proposal is now in tentative form, has been placed before the 48 State bar associations, and is available for the study and suggestions of all students of government. Its primary purpose is to insure to the citizen review of the law, whether made by the Congress or administratively, to determine whether such law is in accord with the Constitution, and independent review of the facts, regardless of the determinations reached by the administrative officer or employee in the administration of such law. This proposed correction of defective administrative machinery requires the most careful study by all interested elements of our population that there may be maintained in all its vigor a "government by the people, for the people, and of the people."

THE NEW DEAL AND THE HOUSEKEEPER—ARTICLE BY SAMUEL CROWTHER

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Samuel Crowther entitled "The New Deal and the Housekeeper", published in the Saturday Evening Post of the issue of March 21, 1936.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of Mar. 21, 1936]

THE NEW DEAL AND THE HOUSEKEEPER

By Samuel Crowther

Do you know that the New Deal and the extravagance it promotes in State and local governments has forced expenditures to a point where you can no longer pay for your Government as you go—that about one-half of the sums paid out are from borrowed money?

2. Do you know that the spending of the New Deal is piling up immense debts and that eventually the money borrowed will have to be paid out of additional taxes?

3. Do you know that women own 80 percent of the life-insurance policies, 65 percent of the savings deposits, 44 percent of the public-utility stocks, 48 percent of the railroad securities, and 40 percent of the real estate?

4. Do you know that women contribute each year $80,000,000 in taxes on life insurance, $83,000,000 in inheritance taxes, and $2,000,000,000 in real-estate taxes?

5. Do you know that there are about 200,000 Federal, State, and local taxing bodies, all lying in wait for your dollar?

6. Do you know that in 1913 only $1 out of every $15.50 you earned went for taxes; that in the depths of the depression in 1932 $1 out of every $5 went for taxes; and that under the New Deal $1 out of every $4 is being taxed from you?

7. Do you know that the unseen dollar a week you pay out of every $4 of income will, at the present rate, soon be $1.50?

8. Do you know that the Nation is spending almost $15,000,000,000 a year for government and that the total income of those with incomes of $5,000 a year and over was only $5,707,071,000 in 1932, and is not much more now?

9. Do you know that $5,700,000,000 of income cannot pay $15,000,000,000 of Government expense, and hence at least two-thirds of the cost must be borne by those whose incomes are less than $5,000 a year—many of whom think they pay no taxes?

10. Do you know that if all incomes over $5,000 a year were taxed 100 percent and the proceeds distributed the result would be only $9.77 per person?

11. Do you know that the oldest political game in the world is concealing who actually pays the taxes by pretending that the rich pay them?

12. Do you know that those who directly pay taxes contribute only a relatively small part of the cost of government and that the big contribution is by those who think they pay no taxes?

13. Do you know that taxes, no matter who writes the checks, can come only out of what is produced? Taxes are not collected from land, for instance, but from what the land produces in the way of rent or crops.

14. Do you know that soaking the big corporations is soaking the wage earners in those corporations? Do you know that a corporation is only a pipe-line arrangement for bringing together capital, goods, and labor, and that present taxes exceed profits, and hence are levied on goods and wages?

15. Do you know that wages make up, on the average, about 85 percent of the cost of production, and thus taxes crush the buying power of wages?

16. Do you know that in nearly every purchase you pay (1) a corporate-income tax, (2) an excess-profits tax, (3) a capital-stock tax, (4) a gasoline tax, (5) a manufacturers' excise tax, (6) a personal-income tax, (7) a commodity license tax, (8) an occupational license tax, (9) an electricity tax, (10) a communications tax, and (11) an insurance tax? Some goods bear more than these taxes; others bear less.

17. Do you know that the dollar was devalued 40 percent in order to raise prices and make debts easier to pay? Do you know that your savings accounts and insurance policies are debts owing to you and that, if dollar devaluation is wholly successful, you will have 40 percent cut from the buying power of your savings?

18. Do you know that the operating taxes of utilities were about 40 percent more in 1935 than in 1933, and that these work out to around $1 a meter a month? So bills of a dollar a month do not even cover taxes.

19. Do you know that in your telephone bill you pay, on the average, $6.76 a year in taxes?

20. Do you know that a considerable portion of what you pay for a telegram is taxes? For taxes take 60 percent of the net profits of the telegraph companies.

21. Do you know, if you own stock in an oil company, that the companies paid an average tax of $5.23 a share, while you got only an average of $1.02 a share?

22. Do you know that when you buy gas or oil at a filling station you pay, in addition to the tax you see, more than 200 unseen taxes?

23. Do you know that you pay $62.72 in taxes, on an average, for the first year's use of a light automobile?

24. Do you know that a loaf of bread accumulates at least 52 taxes on its way to your table?

25. Do you know that these bread taxes amount to about 2 cents a loaf?

26. Do you know that when buying a loaf of bread you pay more for taxes than for the wages of the people who make and sell the bread?

27. Do you know that you pay through the manufacturer 94 taxes and through the druggist 78 more taxes on a bottle of medicine at the drugstore?

28. Do you know that on perfumes, toilet waters, cosmetics, and toilet powders you pay 10 percent of the sales price as a tax? Do you know that on tooth paste, toilet soaps, and mouthwashes you pay 5 percent of the sales price as a tax?

29. Do you know that when smoking a cigarette you are smoking a tax—that the Government gets more than the farmer, the manufacturer, or the retailer?

30. Do you know that in buying an alarm clock you pay a 10-percent luxury tax imposed on the manufacturer, as well as some 30 other taxes?

31. Do you know that in paying for a funeral you pay 157 taxes? Of these, 56 are paid by the manufacturers of funeral supplies, 51 by the funeral directors, and 50 by the burial places.

32. Do you know how to figure out what your income or earnings would be if so much money were not diverted before you ever had a chance to see it? One company with 16,000 men pays an average tax per employee of $1,525 a year as against average wages of $1,725 a year.

33. Do you know that under the Social Security Act all prices must rise and that some will rise from 10 to 20 percent for a doubtful benefit in old-age pensions to less than 3 percent of the community?

34. Do you know that the alternative to raising prices is lowering wages and salaries?

35. Do you know that raising prices or lowering wages as a result of laws amounts to the same thing, and is the most cruel form of concealed taxation?

36. Do you know that a tax levy is only an assertion made by the Government that it knows better how to spend your dollar than you do?

37. Do you know that through taxes the Government can deny you the right to enjoy your earnings and your home?

38. Do you know that taxes are running between 20 and 25 percent of the national income?

39. Do you know that, if taxes mount to 35 percent or more of the national income, state socialism will have arrived, in fact if not in name, and you will be the powerless pawn of the politicians?

40. Do you know that socialism and communism are founded on a denial of the American precept that a dollar primarily belongs to the one who earns it?

SENATOR GORE'S REPLY TO "OPEN LETTER"

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by me in reply to An Open Letter to Senator GORE, which was published in the Independent, of Oklahoma City, Okla. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several other matters which will be furnished later.

There being no objection, the reply was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and permission was granted to print the other matters subsequently. The reply to the open letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1936.

The EDITOR THE INDEPENDENT,
519 West California, Oklahoma City, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR: A copy of the Independent carrying an article entitled "An Open Letter to Senator GORE" came to my office several days since, but came to my personal attention only this morning.

I am in debt to the Independent for reproducing passages from a speech which I delivered at Frederick during my last campaign for the Senate. In that speech I paid homage to the spirit and sacrifices of the Oklahoma pioneer; the spirit which has made Oklahoma, which has made America great in the past, and which alone can keep them in the future.

You ask, "Can it be possible, Senator GORE, that you have forgotten the pioneer days, and the part you played in the carving of a new Commonwealth upon these great western plains?" Of course not. The sentiments and convictions which I entertained then I entertain now—without variableness or the shadow of turning. I have never acquired the facility of the chameleon to change its color to suit its surroundings. I have tried to steer my course by the fixed star of principle, and not by the shooting stars of expediency. Some of my best friends and some of my worst enemies think that I have succeeded too well; think that I have defied the inevitable; think that like the dust-covered toys of Little Boy Blue, I have "stood sturdy and staunch" when I ought to have aped the gyrations of the political weathercock.

You state, "Many of my friends and associates have written to you asking an expression concerning your views of the Patman-Robinson bill, which will be an issue before Congress in the near future." I have from time to time received several letters and telegrams concerning that measure. That bill, it happens, did not pass through a committee of which I am a member. I was, therefore, not familiar with its terms. I could not make answer until I could study its terms and analyze its provisions. This measure had not and has not yet come up for consideration in the Senate. Other matters that were pending and pressing had to be given immediate attention. Much of the time, I, as chairman of the Inter-oceanic Canals Committee, was in charge of the Panama Canal tolls bill on the floor of the Senate.

The very first moment that I could, I gave consideration to the bill with which you are concerned. I found, really to my surprise, that it was nothing more nor less than an amendment to section 2 of the Clayton Act which became a law in 1914. I was a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee which prepared the Clayton Act. I was much interested and took part in the preparation of section 2. It bears my fingerprints.

I find that the Robinson bill is designed to close the loopholes and correct the abuses which experience has disclosed in the operation of the Clayton Act. It seems to me that the measure is reasonably well drawn and calculated to effectuate that end. In that belief I shall give it my support.

Much of my public life has been made up of an effort to prevent the big fish from devouring the little ones. I am not willing to see the little man driven out of business. If we permit him to perish we will miss him when he is gone—when it is too late. My platform in my last race contained only six words: Less taxes, more trade, no trusts. Upon those principles and upon those promises I still stand, and shall stand. This Government should guarantee equal rights and equal opportunities to each and every one of its citizens. That is the highest duty of government, if not its only duty.

There is no foundation in fact for the irresponsible rumors which you embody in your questions. Of course, I have no way to prevent rumor through all of her hundred mouths and all of her forked tongues, from poisoning truth. These rumors were invented and circulated, not to serve the cause of the businessman, but to injure me in my coming race for reelection to the Senate.

You had the justice to say that "I saw you crucified once because you followed the dictates of your conscience and refused to vote for war." I was crucified. I lost my seat in the Senate because I wanted to keep American boys out of the bloody charnal house of Europe. I was misrepresented then as I am misrepresented now. The people were misled then as they are sought to be misled now. As you know, the very men who crucified me then are seeking to crucify me now. They are attempting to defeat me for the Senate.

There is no more truth in the various misrepresentations which you cite and quote than there was in the misrepresentations which resulted in my defeat, and as you say, in my crucifixion in 1920.

You also state that, "Frankly, I discounted these stories at first, as I believed that they came from political enemies, and had been circulated for a definite purpose." As is so often true, your first impression was your best impression. These stories were fabricated and circulated by my "political enemies" in order to mislead the people, in order to deceive the people, and to defeat me. That is their "definite purpose."

Let me say to the people, "Be not deceived."

Very sincerely,

T. P. GORE.

TAXATION, DEPRESSION AND RECOVERY, AND CREDIT

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain matters to be furnished later.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS P. GORE, OF OKLAHOMA, BEFORE THE NATIONAL TAX ASSOCIATION CONVENTION AT OKLAHOMA CITY, OCTOBER 16, 1935

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, and delegates to the convention, I am happy to join other officials of this State and of this city in tendering to you a most cordial welcome to our splendid young commonwealth, as we believe we have the land of youth, and the land of promise, of hope, and of faith, and of optimism. You know, I think the professional optimist and the professional pessimist are guilty of the same failing—they look at the facts through stained spectacles. But in Oklahoma we indulge a rational optimism, and I never knew it to be better illustrated than last spring when the dust storms were prevailing here and which visited even the eastern coast and visited the ships at sea. During the worst of those storms a man was riding along out in the Oklahoma Panhandle and he saw a hat lying on a dust heap. He picked it up and underneath the hat was a human head, and he said, "Hello, neighbor, can't I give you a lift?" "Oh, no," said the man, "I am on a horse, and I will get out all right." Now, we people in Oklahoma with that spirit will come out all right. I was out to the panhandle last week and I heard another story which accentuates the optimism of that region. During the worst of the dust storms, with the dust like the Persian arrows above Thermopylae, it was necessary to pull your car in at noonday to the sidewalk and wait until the dust and the darkness had gone. There was one car occupied by a number of young men and young women, they pulled in to the curb and while they were waiting for the light to return they passed the time singing the old song, "We have the blues when it rains."

Times are improving and we all wish to accelerate that improvement. There are many signs that the East is reddening, that the gray dawn is breaking. We can all see signs and have the belief that the unrisen sun is even now blushing to the dawn.

My friends, I desire without too much pedantry to give you my definition of statesmanship as a sort of background to what I shall say. Someone has defined a statesman as one who computes secondary reactions. Almost anyone can compute primary reactions. My definition would be that statesmanship is computing the final effects, not the first effects. Almost anybody can see or foresee what the first effect of legislation or any other policy will be. It is not the first effect or primary reaction that determines the character of your legislation. It is what settles down as the final effect, as the finished product. We ought to consider the effects of our legislation and we ought to consider the effects of taxation upon our economic structure, upon our economic well-being. We ought to consider the effects of taxation and the expenditure of taxation upon the character of our people if those things have any reaction upon their character, because, after all, our institutions are made in the image of our people.

I am not a tax expert and I feel my limitations in addressing an assemblage of experts. Any hope that my remarks might have any interest at all will be due not to what I shall say but rather to the point of view from which I speak—the point of view not of an expert but of one who has been engaged in the practical matter of tax legislation.

I served some 19 years in the Senate, and 13 years on the Senate Finance Committee, which deals with taxation. And I have dealt with taxation as a fact and not as a theory.

I have chosen this evening the subject, Our Strength and Our Burden. I chose that subject not in order to play the part of the skeleton at the banquet but I do think that we all should weigh our burdens as well as our strength, and measure our strength as well as our burdens. We ought to emulate rather the ant than the grasshopper, rather the bee than the butterfly, and take some account of the future. It is said that the chief difference between the savage and the civilized man is to be found in the fact that the latter makes provision for the future and the former does not. The views which I shall express in this presence may be regarded as somewhat primitive, as somewhat archaic by the experts here assembled, but I am one of those who still believe that taxation is a necessary evil, or, to say the best, that it is a necessary burden. I do not believe there is any such thing as a good tax. Some taxes are better than others; some are worse than others.

I don't think there is such a thing as a good tax per se.

I still think that an unnecessary tax is an unjust tax.

I do not believe taxes ought to be imposed for any purpose except to raise revenue; and I do not believe that revenue ought to be raised for any except for public uses and for public purposes.

I don't think that a tax should be imposed merely to effectuate some economic change, or to carry out some social aim or end as such. You see, the social ends and aims for which I would evoke the power of taxation would be salutary ends and aims; but someone with less wisdom or less infallibility than myself might resort to the taxing power even to undo the idealistic schemes which I had supported.

I presume that nearly everyone has some scheme or dream for distributing wealth, for sharing the wealth of the land. Personally, I think that those who share the work should share the wealth, and that those who share the wealth should share the work, and they should share the wealth in proportion to what they contribute to the production of wealth. That is the best way—if, indeed, it is not the only way—to keep the hand of the privileged out of the pockets of the unprivileged. For my part, I desire to do so. The great scholar John Fiske, of President Long's State at one time, declared that where the power to tax resides there sovereignty resides. The power to tax, the power to take what one man has earned by the sweat of his brow and apply it to the uses or the needs of another man or other men, is the power of sovereignty. Indeed, that is almost as much power as any tyrant has sought or has coveted. I believe it was Hegel who said that the only lesson that we learn from history is that we learn no lesson from history. But there is one lesson so conspicuous that we cannot fail to learn it; that lesson is that many of the greatest revolutions of the past have been due to excessive and ruinous taxation. Rehoboam laid a heavy yoke on Israel. He told them that his little finger would be thicker than the loins of his father; and he drove the 10 tribes into rebellion, and they established an independent kingdom.

Charles the First of England resorted to arbitrary taxation in the form of ship money, and that first lost him his crown and then lost him his head.

The British Parliament imposed taxes upon our colonial ancestors without their consent and revolt rent the British Empire asunder. Excessive taxes imposed by the King of France and the nobles of France precipitated that country into revolution, one of the bloodiest revolutions in all the bloody tides of time. But this subject is interesting not on account of these revolutions in the past, not alone on that account; the subject of taxation is of vital concern today to every inhabitant of every civilized nation on the globe. It touches every man, woman, and child. The pressure of taxation is as universal as the pressure of the atmosphere upon the earth's surface. It touches every point, it touches everyone. There is no exception to that rule in a civilized land.

John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, said more than a hundred years ago: "The power to tax is the power to destroy"—the power to tax is the power to destroy. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, commenting upon that dictum of the Chief Justice, said that at first blush it might seem to be an overstatement, but upon fullest analysis it proved to be literally true. He said that the government that can tax your property or your income 1 percent can tax it 10 percent, can tax it 100 percent, and can really make your property and your income valueless to you, can destroy the value of property and the value of your income.

Delegates to this convention, let us see how omnipresent is this taxing power.

In the United States today we have 182,651 governmental units vested with the sovereign power to tax, vested with the sovereign power to levy taxes, to collect taxes; vested with the sovereign power to create debts; vested with the sovereign power to destroy—182,651 governmental units, including school districts. That is one taxing unit for every 16 square miles in the United States, one taxing unit for every 700 inhabitants of the United States. This system of taxation is not only extensive, it is intensive; it is not only horizontal, it is vertical, it is a pyramid.

Here in Oklahoma City there are five governments or subdivisions of government which impose taxes upon the inhabitants of this city. The Nation taxes the taxpayers in this city; the State taxes the taxpayers in this city; the county taxes the taxpayers in this city; the city taxes the taxpayers in this city; the school board taxes the taxpayers in this city; to take no account of special assessments for special improvements.

There are the hands of five governments in the pockets of the taxpayers of this town in each and every case. What have these five governments taken from the pockets of the taxpayers with their five hands? They have taken $130—not $130 for every taxpayer in Oklahoma City—but these five governments take $130 from every man, woman, and child within the gates of the city. I speak, of course, of the per-capita tax, which, in this city, as throughout the United States, amounts to $130 per capita. That is $650 of taxes extracted from every family of five within the Republic. Now, $650 is one-half the annual income of our wage earners prior to that evil day when prosperity disappeared around the corner—$130 apiece for every infant in the nursery.

Now, when the Government exercises the taxing power, just what does it do? Simply operates a siphon. The suction end is in the pockets of the taxpayer or in the pocketbook of the taxpayer, and the other end is emptying into the pocket of the individual who happens to receive or enjoy the proceeds of the tax.

John C. Calhoun divided the people into taxpayers and tax eaters and deprecated the day when the tax eaters instead of the taxpayers should dominate the Government. He said he feared that would be an evil day for our free institutions. Other democracies have died. The graveyard of the nations has many tombstones marking the burial place of free governments, of democracies, and of republics.

Of course, I am not talking of politics now; but we do not want to run by all the stop lights. We indulge in a good deal of fine talk about obtaining money from the Public Treasury, and all our appropriation bills conclude with this phrase—so much money "is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." Now, when you analyze this Public Treasury and break it down into its parts, what does it consist of? It simply consists of an unlimited number of little pocketbooks—of your pocketbook and my pocketbook—and when the Government of the United States puts its hand into the Public Treasury, in order to take out a dollar, the tips of the fingers either penetrate your pocketbook and mine, and the dollar that is withdrawn from the Public Treasury is withdrawn from your private treasury, from your pocketbook or from the pocketbook of some other honest, toiling, patriotic American citizen. Have no illusions upon that point.

We hear a great deal about grants and loans. The General Government makes loans to States, counties, and cities. If they raise 55 percent, the Government makes a grant or a gift of 45 percent. Just where does that 45 percent come from? It comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. It is not a gift. In a real sense it represents taxes taken out of your pockets by the Federal Government to supplement the taxes which are taken out of your pockets by the State, county, or local governments—dollars matching dollars.

A great deal of the discussion about tax reform consists merely in redistributing the burdens of taxation. What would really count would be a lessening of the burdens of taxation. To lift the burden from one individual to another is sometimes important, sometimes vital. To lift the burden from one shoulder to another may sometimes be of service. It may stop the goose from squawking. Colbert said the science of taxation consisted in plucking the goose, getting as many feathers with as little squawking as possible. So, this matter of merely shifting the burden of taxation from one to another does not quite answer my ideal of tax reform.

We have taken a glimpse at our burdens; let us take a glance for a moment, at our strength, our assets, our resources. We have today in a substantial sense all the material wealth, all the natural resources, all the physical property that we had prior to the panic. We have all the lands, fields, forests, mines, we have pretty much all the capital, buildings, bridges, railroads, mills, machinery; we have more money, marvelous to tell. Measured in terms of new dollars, we have nearly twice as much gold today, or more, than we had prior to the panic. We have not only all of the material wealth and the natural resources, we have all the human resources, we have all the labor, skill, talent, and enterprise—I hope we have all the enterprise. We have all these natural and all these human resources that we had when we were enjoying a measure of prosperity, and yet these human and natural resources are not quite enough to insure prosperity. Something in addition to all those that we had then we do not have now. What is that thing so essential to prosperity which we had then and which has now taken flight? Some say confidence, and, for the want of a better term, let us adopt the word. But I shall not pursue that subject.

In 1929, the year of the peak and the crash, our national wealth was estimated at three hundred and fifty billions, or a little more than that figure. In 1933 it had shrunk to two hundred and thirteen billions. There was a shrinkage of 40 percent in our national wealth in a period of less than 5 years. In 1932 our material wealth aggregated two hundred and thirteen billions, and in 1932 our debts, public and private, long and short term, aggregated two hundred and thirty-eight billions. We owed twenty-five billions more than we owned; we owned twenty-five billions less than we owed. Now, the individual whose liabilities exceed his assets is in the shadow of bankruptcy. So much for our wealth.

What about our income?

In 1929 our national income aggregated seventy-eight billions. In 1932—and I adopted a different year, I am sorry I have not the statistics for 1932—in 1933 our income had shrunk to forty-four billions, a shrinkage of 43½ percent.

Let us break these incomes down into the several shares, enjoyed by the different groups who take part in production and distribution of wealth in this country—into wages, rents, dividends, interest, and profits. The Nation must get its income out of the people's income; the Nation must derive its revenue from the people's revenue, and the people must pay out of their incomes their respective shares of the Nation's income. They must pay out of their wages, their salaries, their dividends, their rents, their interest, and their profits; must pay the Nation's income, or else they must invade their savings or their capital.

From 1929 to 1933—and 1933 was the low-water mark—from 1929 to 1933 wages and salaries shrunk from a little more than fifty to a little less than thirty billions, a shrinkage of 43 percent; profits, or what these economists call withdrawals of entrepreneur—whatever that happens to mean—twelve and one-half billions in 1929 to seven and one-half billions in 1933, a shrinkage of 40 percent. Dividends shrank from six billions in 1929 to two billions in 1933, a shrinkage of 66 percent; and remember that dividends in those days were paid out of surplus and not out of earnings. Rents shrank from 1929 to 1933 from three and one-half billions, a little less, down to a little less than one billion, a shrinkage of 70 percent. Interest from 1929 to 1933 shrank from $5,100,000,000 down to $4,600,000,000, a shrinkage of only 10 percent. Of course, interest charges are fixed charges, and the most rigid of all, because the interest rate is "nominated in the bond."

Out of these diminished incomes our taxpayers were called upon to furnish our various governments with various governmental incomes—National, State, and local.

In 1932 all our governmental expenditures, National, State, and local, approximated fourteen billions. In 1933 it was a little more than fourteen billions, so that in 1933 as much as one-third of the people's income had to be surrendered by the people in order to pay our various governments the incomes which they required. In other words, $1 out of every $3 received in any form—wages, salaries, interest, dividends, rents—was parted with by the taxpayer out of his income to make up the income of our various forms of government. I am not here distinguishing between taxes and loans. I am not complaining of this. I am merely stating the fact, because we ought to have the courage to face the fact.

For the current year our expenditures by the National Government alone are slightly in excess of $10,000,000,000. It amounts to $28,000,000 a day. It amounts to a little more than a million dollars an hour—a million dollars an hour not for 6 hours, not for 8 hours of the day, but for 24 hours in the day.

Not long ago Congress passed a new tax measure. It was heralded by some as a measure to "soak the rich", as a measure to make the rich pay their full share of our national governmental expense, a measure to make the rich sit in, and out of their income pay their fair share of the Nation's income or revenue. The rich ought to pay their full share of our governmental expenses. Perhaps they enjoy the greater protection, and they ought to bear a share proportionate to their ability. But, do you know that that measure will raise $250,000,000 a year, and do you know that $250,000,000 will pay our running expenses at current rates for a little less than 10 days? We have drafted the rich into service, we are making them sit in, we are making them pay their full share of governmental expenses, and we are making them defray the expenses of the National Government for a little less than 10 days with this additional legislation.

The question that haunts me like a death's-head is this: Who will pay the expenses of this Government during the other 355 days in the year? Not the rich, according to this ostentatious computation, because they are to run us for 10 days. The expenses for the other 355 days, are they to be paid by the common man, by the middle classes? Are they to be paid by the producer, by the farmer, by the wage earner, by Tom, Dick, and Harry? Who is to bear this vast burden during the other 355 days?

Did you ever reflect that if the Government of the United States should take each and every income in the United States in excess of $50,000 a year, the aggregate sum thus taken would pay our running expenses at current rates for less than 5 weeks. I say this in order to reinforce, if I need reinforce, my unvarying insistence that the Government should get a dollar's worth of service or a dollar's worth of work or a dollar's worth of improvements for every dollar that it extracts from the pocketbooks of the American taxpayers.

Alexander Hamilton declared more than 150 years ago that the Government had to get its revenue out of the backs and the bellies of the people. I am afraid you will find no other resource in the last analysis; and there is no greater illusion, no illusion more seductive or more cheating, no illusion more false or unfounded upon facts than that the average man does not pay a Federal tax unless his name appears upon the roll of income-tax payers in the United States.

Go down to Massachusetts, where they make the shoes that we wear. When the shoe factory sold the shoes that you have on your feet, it no doubt collected the cost of the tacks which were driven in to keep the taps on the heels. When you paid for those shoes you paid for the tacks that were driven into the heel. When that factory sold those shoes, it also drove into the heel of the shoe the taxes which it had paid the county, city, State, and Federal Governments whose jurisdiction extended over its factory. And when you bought and paid for those shoes, you paid for the tacks and you paid for the tax—"if you know what I mean." Let no one have any other illusion.

It is not untimely to give these warnings, because the matter cannot proceed indefinitely. We ought to take pause, because nations in the past have fallen on account of excessive and ruinous taxation. I suppose we will not follow in their footsteps, but I will read at this point one passage from a noted historian concerning the fall of the Roman Empire:

"The desire and possibility of accumulation languished and men produced only what would suffice for their immediate needs, for the Government laid in wait for all savings; capital vanished; the souls of men were palsied; population fled from what was called civilization and sought concealment and relief in barbarism and with barbarians."

I do not anticipate or prophesy any such fate for this great Republic; but, of course, in order to avoid the end and the fate that befell the Roman Empire, we must avoid the means which brought those ends to pass.

Just for a moment I wish to make application of these facts to my own State of Oklahoma.

Oklahoma has today two and one-half millions of people. We have 6,353 governmental units exercising the power to tax—1 for every 11 square miles; 1 for every 397 inhabitants. The total value of all our property assessed for taxation purposes is $1,258,000,000. Our indebtedness, public and private, long term and short term, aggregates $2,340,000,000. Our assessed valuation is $1,258,000,000. Our indebtedness aggregates $2,340,000,000. That is $1,000 for every inhabitant of our State, on the average. The infant in its cradle owes $1,000, and every family in the State owes on an average $4,000.

Oklahoma is a young State and has been fortunate. Our per-capita indebtedness is only one-half of that for the country at large, which is $2,000. I will say in passing that we do not in this State assess mineral property for taxation purposes; but the interest on our indebtedness amounts to $100,000,000 a year.

Our State and local taxes last year aggregated $101,000,000, including special taxes. Our share of Federal taxation amounted to $76,000,000. Our freight and passenger charges last year amounted to $60,000,000. Our insurance premiums of all kinds amounted to $50,000,000.

The Social Security Act lately passed will in 1940 impose an additional charge of $38,000,000 on the people of Oklahoma. In 1945 it will amount to $45,000,000. In 1950 it will amount to $56,000,000. And I may say, at this point, that for the country at large in 1940 that measure will impose a charge upon the people of this country—not taxes, but a charge—upon their incomes of $2,600,000,000; in 1945, $3,200,000,000; in 1950, $4,000,000,000. But let us cast this item out of the account as a future rather than a present charge. These various and sundry fixed charges, as you may term them, amount to $387,000,000 a year in Oklahoma. Oklahoma's share of the national and State and local expenditures combined last year amounted to $237,000,000. Two hundred and thirty-seven million dollars the people of Oklahoma were required to pay last year out of their earnings to defray the expenses of our various forms of government. All the farm produce marketed in this State last year brought $109,000,000. All the oil marketed in this State last year brought $183,000,000. All the manufactured products marketed in this State last year brought approximately $190,000,000. I cite these figures in order to show that we must sooner or later have a care or expenditures will absorb too much of our revenues and of our income, and it will not be possible for the citizen to pay both his taxes and his living expenses in accordance with the recognized American standards.

I hope this is not the voice of a pessimist, but merely the voice of one who would sound a warning before the hour has struck when the hour will be too late.

Those are problems which you must consider and consider as experts.

Unemployment has been the most vexatious problem arising out of this depression. The problem of unemployment is still with us, and there is but one solution of the problem of unemployment, and that is employment—that and that alone.

We hear a great deal about the Government providing aid and relief for the unemployed, and we have 10,000,000 of unemployed, and the Government has been providing relief for the families of the unemployed running up to 22,000,000 at one time.

When we speak of the Government providing aid and relief for the unemployed, just what does that mean? In the last analysis it means that the employed are providing aid and relief for the unemployed. That is what it means and that is all that it means. Of course, every man that is unemployed, every woman that is unemployed, who needs work and wants work and is willing to work, every such instance is a living tragedy. That is the problem which calls loudest for solution.

An experiment was tried in Waterbury, Conn., which I suggested in the Finance Committee and on the floor of the Senate, which I think might have been serviceable.

Waterbury adopted this plan early in the depression: She laid a tax of 1 percent on all incomes within the city of less than $25 a week, 2 percent upon all incomes between $25 and $50 a week, 3 percent on all incomes in excess of $50 a week. One concern, the Scoville Manufacturing Co., paid $1,500 a week; one brass concern paid $1,200 a week; another taxpayer a little more than $1,000 a week. The city appointed four members of a committee of seven, and these three largest taxpayers appointed an additional member each. That committee of seven administered the fund, passing on those who would receive employment, and all that were on the list were required to work. The system worked. According to the last report, it worked with astounding success. Whether it has broken down at the present time I am not advised. I mention that to you now in order that you can take it home with you, because this problem is not yet solved.

One additional thing we should keep in mind is to put our feet in the path that leads to ultimate balancing of the Budget.

I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 23 before the adjournment of the last session, which proposed to raise a joint committee of the two Houses on Revenue and Expenditure, five members from the two Appropriation Committees of the two Houses, five members from the Ways and Means Committee, and five members from the Senate Finance Committee. They were empowered to employ experts, and that committee was charged with the duty of investigating our revenue laws, our resources, and devising our taxation laws and our appropriations so as to bring ultimately our revenues and our expenditures into balance.

We cannot balance the Budget overnight, but we can adopt a policy with the balancing of the Budget as a fixed and as a definite objective, and the sooner that objective is determined upon, the sooner we will begin our progress out of this depression, finally to better days and a better time.

I do not think that America is a mistake; yet, I do not wish to pursue the paths which have led other governments to the cemetery of the nations. As long as we adhere to the principles upon which our free institutions were built, as long as we cherish and preserve the virtues of our fathers—self-reliance, self-denial, and self-respect; so long as we cherish those virtues which have made us great in the past, and which alone can keep us great in the future; as long as we cleave to those principles, as long as we cherish those virtues we can look with confidence to the future, and I doubt not that no matter how dark the night and no matter how distant the dawn—if we cherish those principles and those virtues, I doubt not that the glories that are to come will equal, if they do not surpass, the glories that are gone. I thank you.

REMARKS BY HON. THOMAS P. GORE OF OKLAHOMA ON POST-WAR DEPRESSION AND RECOVERY, AT THE ANNUAL DINNER OF KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, AT WALTHAM, MASS., FEBRUARY 20, 1922

The best way to serve the God of things as they ought to be is to keep in touch with the "God of things as they are." What America needs is not a coroner but a physician. What she needs at the hands of a physician is not an autopsy but a diagnosis. Indeed, it is more than that. We feel the symptoms, we know the causes of our economic distress. What is the cure? It is not so much the way into our troubles that concerns us as it is the way out. What caused existing economic conditions is interesting, but what will cause an improvement in these conditions is vital.

Europe has her primary problems which from our standpoint may be secondary but still they are important. America has her primary problems which, from Europe's standpoint may be secondary, but which are not unimportant to Europe.

The civilized world is divided into sovereign and independent nations. Each sovereign nation is a distinct and separate body politic. The fundamental notion underlying international law is the equality of independent States. This is the theory. As to large nations the theory may be true; as to small nations, equality is a mere fiction. But people cling with tenacity to legal and political fictions. We do not like to have our household myths destroyed. Politically speaking, therefore, there is absolute equality among the independent nations of the earth, in a political sense, the nations of the earth are independent of each other.

But the modern world is an economic unit. The different nations are but parts of an economic whole. Modern transportation and, if I may say so, the division of labor among the different countries have fused the several countries into one economic community. Whatever affects the industry and commerce of one country must affect in greater or less degree every industrial and commercial country. There is no such thing as economic independence among the nations of the earth, high protectionists to the contrary, notwithstanding. We may dabble about the political independence of the different nations, but we must admit their economic interdependence.

I shall do no more than refer to the incalculable losses sustained by the different belligerent countries in the recent war—the enormous destruction of labor and capital, of life, and property. Not only were multiplied billions of wealth destroyed, not only were millions of lives destroyed, but two hundred billions of debt were left to absorb or to redistribute the earnings of the future. Most of these losses were unavoidable once battle was joined. Most of them constitute the cost sheet of war, the price of waging war. Hence, I call them unavoidable losses after the sword was drawn. There were losses no doubt due to extravagance and mismanagement which may be set down as the avoidable losses of the war. This distinction may now be regarded, perhaps, as academic without practical utility.

There is neither strategy nor heroism in deceiving ourselves. There may be those who will be surprised to hear me say that you cannot get rid of a disagreeable fact merely by denying or disregarding it. You cannot impart wisdom to an unsound policy merely by reposing childlike faith in its efficacy. The truth may not make us free in an economic sense, but it may enable us to get rid of a good deal of superstition and destroy a good deal of credulity as to economic fallacies and as to legislative omnipotence or legerdemain.

What we need is a survey of the facts, a checking of realities. We need to run the boundary line between the possible and the impossible. We need to know what part of our economic distress will yield to treatment, and what, if any, will not; what part is remediable, what part, if any, is irremediable. What we need to know is what part of our economic ills is to be set down as a part of the price of waging and winning the war—as the inevitable and unavoidable price of waging and winning the war. We know that the priceless lives which were yielded up upon the battlefields of France and Flanders constitute a part of the price of waging and winning the war. This part we know is past remedy—is past repair. Neither storied urn nor animated bust can back to its mansion call the fleeting breath. What part of our economic losses is likewise past remedy and repair?

We need to know what part of our existing distress is due primarily to the economic interdependence between Europe and America. In other words, how would the account have stood with us if we had not entered the war? We would, of course, have enjoyed prosperity while the war lasted. But when the war ended there would have been inevitable distress or stagnation in this country resulting from the destruction of life and property and credit in Europe—from the lost purchasing power on the part of European customers. We should appraise or approximate the extent of those evil consequences which were inseparable from the war itself and which were not due to our participation in the war. The consequences we were powerless to prevent. Where there is no power there is no responsibility. When the United States entered the war it was both necessary and desirable that the war should be prosecuted by all practical means to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion. But we should appraise or approximate the economic losses which were inseparable from the vigorous and victorious prosecution of the war. Armies had to be raised. Millions of men had to be withdrawn from industry. The industrial life of the country had to be reorganized or readjusted. Unprecedented taxes had to be levied. Unexampled debts had to be contracted.

These things were part of the inevitable, of the unavoidable price of waging and winning the war. These things were followed by inflation. How much of this inflation could have been prevented? Inflation with its hectic prosperity was followed by deflation, with its inevitable losses and adversity. To what extent would deflation have been prevented, or to what extent could its evil consequences have been moderated or counteracted? If we had consulted the oracles of history, we might have foreseen the course of events. Great wars are often followed for a limited period with increasing prices and abounding prosperity. This period is generally followed by a collapse or reaction, characterized by falling prices, unemployment, and industrial stagnation. The War of 1812 was followed by increasing prices and prosperous times for a period of approximately 2 years. Then came reaction. The Civil War was followed by increasing prices and unabated prosperity for a period approximating 8 years. Then came reaction—a long period of stagnation—a period of depression which lasted for nearly a score of years with but slight interruption. The present depression of 1921 should not last so long, owing to improved business organization and the stability and resources of credit institutions. But as the depression is not due to ourselves alone, the recovery cannot be controlled by ourselves alone.

Viewing the events and measures of the war in retrospect, it may be possible now, if it was not possible then, to differentiate between those losses or the causes of those losses which were inevitable and unpreventable from those which might by prudence and foresight have been moderated or prevented. It is devoutly to be wished that we may never have occasion to consult the lamp of experience again respecting the conduct of war, but it is well enough to keep in mind, should the exigency arise, that there is such a lamp.

What we need to know now, after ascertaining what part of our economic troubles, if any, are past remedy, is this: What part of these troubles is remediable by time and its healing alone? What part is remediable by industry and thrift alone? And what part is remediable by legislation alone? Perhaps it would be better to say and wiser to ascertain what part of our existing evils will not yield to the enchantment of legislation—will not yield to the imperious "Be it enacted" of legislatures, congresses, and parliaments. What part will not yield to grandiloquent oratory (outside of Massachusetts; I should have said flap-doodle oratory). What part cannot be remedied by repealing the laws of physics and economics and experimenting with panaceas which have no roots in the past and no sanction, no certificate avouched either by reason or by experience.

Some of our statesmen conceived the notion during the war that mountains could be removed by their faith or word or their "Be it enacted"; that buildings could be constructed with the center of gravity outside the base—professors who spend their vacations perfecting schemes of perpetual motion; doctors and postgraduates from Dean Swift's Academy of Lagado.

We need to keep in mind to what extent our own depression has been caused by the collapse and loss of purchasing power on the part of Europe. We need to ascertain to what extent our own recovery must be preceded or accompanied by recovery on the part of Europe and to what extent and in what way we can accelerate the recovery of Europe. We can undoubtedly lend a helping hand to Europe without entering into an entangling alliance with European powers, without signing a bond to take part in all their wars and to unsheathe our sword in all their battles. A creditor may do something to assist his debtor without giving him the money with which to discharge his debt.

The first unmistakable sign of our existing economic troubles was the break-down in the price of farm products. The crop of 1921 was satisfactory, both in quantity and quality, but it was worth $8,000,000,000 less to the farmer than the crop of 1919, and, judged by the same standard, it was worth three and a half billions less than the crop of 1920. The crop was not in excess of the world's need, but it was in excess of the world's economic demand. The break in price was primarily due to the loss of purchasing power on the part of our European customers who usually absorbed the surplus. Our export of farm products did not fall off so much in volume as in value. Indeed, we exported 9 percent more cotton in 1921 than in 1920, but the value declined 55 percent. It is value that counts in commerce.

The loss of purchasing power on the part of our farmers resulting from the ruinous prices of farm products reacted, of course, upon the prosperity of all our industrial and commercial classes. The manufacturers could not sell, could not be sure of a market. They had to close down or slow down. This resulted in much unemployment. These constitute the essentials of stagnation and distress.

What is the way out? What is the remedy for all those ills that are remediable? World-wide effects must be accounted for by world-wide causes, and they will yield only to treatment whose effects are world-wide, if not in scope, at least in their reactions. There are certain European problems which can be solved by the European powers alone. Their failure to solve these problems has hindered the improvement of conditions both in Europe and in America. Much as we suffer from their inaction, we have no authority to meddle in their affairs. I have great faith in free discussion. There can be no objection to a discussion of those problems and those difficulties on the part of those who are mutually concerned in their solution or in their removal. A willingness to confer does not imply an obligation to commit ourselves to an undesirable settlement.

Of course, a vast majority of our industrial and commercial ailments are to be removed or improved by the return to our ancient and approved system of a high protective tariff, or so it is said. I feel free to allude to this subject on account of New England's known aversion to the mob spirit. I feel safe. Europe and the world can purchase the surplus output of our field and factories in only three ways—by the shipment of gold, by the shipment of goods, by the transfer of credits. Europe has no gold to spend or spare. We have the gold. From some unaccountable economic aberration we placed an embargo on gold. We adopted the policy pursued by Spain after the discovery of America. She imagined that gold and silver constituted national wealth, prohibited their export, and has suffered a protracted attack of creeping paralysis or sleeping sickness. The cruise of credit has pretty well run dry, although something might still be done to replenish its flow. Europe must exchange its surplus goods for our surplus goods. But we propose to erect a high tariff so that she cannot exchange her goods for ours. In 1920 our total imports were around $5,200,000,000. In 1921 were $3,600,000,000. There was a falling off in a single year of one and a half billions—about 33 percent in value. We now propose to raise the tariff so as to reduce still further these imports, which must still further diminish our exports.

In 1920 we exported $3,100,000,000 worth, and in 1921 only six and a half billion dollars worth. To reduce imports is to reduce exports. To stop buying is to stop selling.

In addition to all this it seems that we are to have American valuation. This is carrying Herbert Spencer's doctrine of individualism beyond the limit of his extremist fancy. It practically transfers the power to tax from Congress to each American producer or at any rate to each class of American producers. If any class concludes that the tariff duties are not high enough for its special interests, all it has to do is to raise the price of its product and the tariff protection automatically is increased. In olden times, each city and town in Europe had a tariff system of its own. We are refining upon this method in modern times and propose to let each individual have a tariff system of his own, or each class a tariff system of its own. I suppose this is the American definition of "liberty, equality, fraternity." Victor Hugo said that in France those words signified "infantry, cavalry, artillery."

As I am now enjoying the luxury of private life exempt from the cares of official responsibilities, I am watching with interest the effort on the part of our statesmen to raise money for the soldier's bonus without increasing taxes or issuing bonds. I am also watching the effort of our diplomats, our Tallyrands, to enter into an entangling alliance without entanglements. Some of us who looked upon the League of Nations as a full-grown dragon may regard the 4-power pact as the dragon's whelp, while others whelp, while others of us may look upon it as an angel of light coming—if not to beat the sword into a plowshare—at least, to beat the battleship into an aircraft, or coming to establish peace on earth and good will among some men.

ADDRESS BY HON. THOMAS P. GORE, OF OKLAHOMA, BEFORE THE NEW YORK CREDIT MEN'S ASSOCIATION, NEW YORK CITY, JANUARY 25, 1916

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, and I regret that I cannot, for reasons too delicate to mention, say "my fellow creditors" [laughter], I am deeply grateful to your presiding officer for this most graceful presentation. I wish that I deserved the splendid encomiums which he has showered upon me out of the generosity of his heart. My only acknowledgment must be that my gratitude is equal to his generosity.

More than any other class, the credit men embody and illustrate the principle of "each for all and all for each." It seems to me that in an assemblage of credit men one ought to be either extremely happy or extremely miserable, depending upon his latitude with reference to that great equator done in red. I realize that in addressing this association of credit men I am not only guilty of carrying coals to Newcastle but I am carrying gold to Ophir and diamonds to Holeanda. There is nothing either new or illuminating that I can say to you either upon the history, the theory, or the philosophy of credit.

I appreciate the danger of employing figures of speech in discussing an economic question, or in discussing any other subject which requires considerable accuracy of speech.

By a sort of accepted metaphor money has been likened unto the blood in the arteries of trade and commerce. With equal propriety we may characterize credit as the very breath of the life of modern business.

Judged by its manifestations, credit in the commercial world bears an even more striking resemblance to electricity in the physical universe. Electricity is subtle, is unsubstantial, invisible, inaudible, impalpable, imponderable, whatever that train of adjectives may mean. [Applause.] Electricity is a force so deft that it may operate the most delicate "instrument of precision", a force so tremendous and universal that it holds the fixed stars in their places, and binds the wandering planets to their appointed courses.

Credit is silent, subtle, unsubstantial. It is imperceptible to the senses, and yet credit is a force, a commercial force so slight that it cares for the smallest transaction on the retail counter, and is a force sufficient to finance embattled nations, distraught with blood and war.

What is this thing credit? What is this thing so subtle that it eludes sight, touch, and feeling and yet is so mighty that without it the modern business world itself would dissolve like the unsubstantial fabric of a vision and leave scarce a rack behind?

Credit is a promise to pay. That is the vital spark, the vital principle of all credit. The simple promise to pay is the germ from which the credit system, with all its delicate adjustments, with all its stupendous strength, has been evolved.

A credit transaction is the present transfer of a thing of value in consideration of a promise equivalent to be rendered in the future. Futurity is one of its essentials, as confidence or security is another of its essentials. But the credit system itself is not to be identified with credit. The credit system involves the modes or methods of conducting credit transactions and payments; and it may be said to include the various agencies and institutions which have been devised for carrying on and facilitating such transactions and payments.

Personal credit or confidence in a limited form may exist in the rudest society, but a credit system is one of the distinguishing characteristics of a highly organized commercial society.

Is credit capital? Are debts wealth? Is a promise to pay either capital or wealth? Are the instruments of credits themselves wealth? This is a much-controverted question. I do not mean to decide it ex cathedra. I may say in passing that if the instruments of credit are not wealth, they bear a very marked and striking family resemblance to wealth. Mr. McLeod declares with great emphasis that credit instruments are not only wealth but that they constitute one of the most important categories of wealth. Mr. Price and others insist with equal emphasis that credit instruments are not wealth; that they are mere claims to wealth, that they are the representatives of wealth. It seems to me that Mr. Seligman has indicated the distinction with scientific precision. He says that while credit instruments are not wealth, in the strictest sense of the term, they are in the strictest sense of the term "property." Property involves a legal conception, the idea of exclusive ownership and appropriation, a right to take cognizance of by the law, and like wealth, capable of exchange, of being bought and sold. But it can hardly be insisted that if each of the 700 men in this presence should execute his promissory note for $100 to his neighbor sitting on his right and on his left there would thus be created $1,400,000 of wealth, nor can it be insisted that by passing a single one-hundred-dollar bill from hand to hand and liquidating these promissory notes there would thus be extinguished, annihilated approximately a million and a half of real wealth in the twinkling of an eye. It can hardly be maintained that the New York Clearing House daily extinguishes millions and yearly extinguishes billions of actual wealth. Property rights can be thus created and extinguished, but not capital, not wealth. But, waiving this distinction, the importance of credit in the business world can hardly be overestimated, can hardly be overstated.

The commercial and industrial history of mankind has been divided into three great epochs: The age of barter, the age of money, and the age of credits.

The history of every civilized country indicates that it has passed through this evolution.

Even today in different quarters of the globe we see people in each of these different economic stages or in course of transition from one unto the other.

Barter is the first and the simplest form of exchange, and even barter is preceded by a system of voluntary presents, the exchange of gifts. In course of time it came to pass that these reciprocal presents were expected to be approximately equal in value, and neglect on the part of a barbaric trader to observe this tenet of commercial morality led to the first commercial war, to retaliation, and bloodshed. We and other commercial nations are in the full blaze and splendor of the credit age. Ninety-five percent of all commercial transactions are carried by means of credit, rather than cash. Excluding the retail business, 99 percent of payments, 99 percent of commercial transactions are carried on not in cash but through the instrumentality of credits.

It is said that the great naturalist, Cuvier, could from a single fossil bone of an extinct species of animal reconstruct the framework of an individual of the species. This was due to his knowledge of anatomy and the necessary relations between the different parts of the animal organism.

An economist and jurist of equal skill could take the commercial laws and customs of an extinct people, of a forgotten nation, and determine with marked precision the stage of its progress and the state of its civilization.

A system of credits implies certain conditions as precedent, as prerequisite to or as coincident with its very existence. A credit system implies stability of government, security of property, the accumulation of capital, machinery for the collection of debts, or the punishment of defaulting debtors. A credit system implies the existence of ethical standards, a sense of obligation and responsibility, of confidence between man and man.

Herbert Spencer has said, with truth, that in a society "where every man was thief or liar", credit would be an impossibility, borrowing and lending would be unknown. So that the existence of a credit system proves the existence of comparatively high ethical and commercial standards. [Applause.] The telltale ruins of ancient Babylon render up her commercial secrets and her commercial history. She had a system of credits, banking institutions. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, and insurance were commercial agencies and practices amongst her people.

This demonstrates that she had a highly organized state of economic society.

Within the limits and conditions which I have enumerated, the history of the rate of interest indicates the ratio between the supply of capital and the demand for capital, indicates the prevailing condition as to prosperity or depression, indicates the peculiar hazard incident to a particular business or of a particular individual in a given transaction. This is a most illuminating and significant history.

In ancient Greece the rate of interest ranged from 12 to 18 percent, and the rate of interest in maritime transactions was allowed to mount up to 33 percent. I take this as conclusive proof that John Skelton Williams was not Comptroller of the Currency in ancient Greece. [Applause and laughter.]

In Rome the laws of the Twelve Tables fixed the rate of interest at 12 percent, 1 percent a month. All legal interest was afterward entirely prohibited, at least for a time, and during that time usury ran riot.

Under the reign of Augustus Caesar the prevailing rate was only 4 percent, a period of remarkable peace and security.

Under Justinian's Code, adopted in the sixth century, the rate of interest which persons of wealth were allowed to charge was only 4 percent. Six percent was the legal rate. Merchants might be charged as much as 8 percent, and in maritime transactions as much as 12 percent.

The history of interest and interest rates in England typifies the struggle between arbitrary human ordinances on the one hand and the fundamental laws and principles of trade and commerce upon the other. I shall not weary your patience with an enumeration of rates and dates. For centuries there has been through various laws an endeavor to regulate interest and penalize usury. They have not only made an effort to prevent usury and regulate interest, but they made an effort to regulate prices, and all this history illustrates the difficulty of regulating interest upon any other ground than that of monopoly. It shows the sovereignty of the natural laws of commerce and of business.

We too have our interest and usury problems here in the United States. I suppose it always has been with us, perhaps it always will be with us, but rates of interest ranging from 25 to 2,100 percent, as recently revealed by the Comptroller of the Currency, can hardly be characterized as legitimate banking. A risk which demands such a rate of interest is not banking, it is gambling, and legitimate borrowers should not be fined to insure transactions involving so high a hazard.

The Koran forbade the followers of Mohammed to charge or receive interest. "They who devour usury shall not arise from the dead", said the prophet of Allah. This interdiction of interest is one of the principal factors explaining the universal industrial and commercial stagnation which prevails wherever Mohammedism prevails. That ordinance takes away the incentive to economy and thrift. It takes away the opportunity for investment. It takes away the possibility of profit. The Mohammedan hoards his money. He buries his gold; and buried treasures bear no fruit, no golden apples of the Hesperides. They are as barren as the accursed fig tree. Until socialism comes, interest and profits must continue to be in the future, as they have been in the past, one of the chief incentives to economy and thrift, to industrial progress, and to commercial prosperity.

Credit surcharges capital with efficiency; it woe hoarded treasure from its hiding place; it gathers up bits of capital too small to be used separately and on their own account. It transfers capital from those who are content with mere investment to those who desire to engage in productive enterprise and industry. Credit affords talent the benefit of capital and opportunity, and affords society the benefit of talent. Credit abolishes the difference between the past, the present, and future tenses.

Credit enables the present to lay under contribution all the accumulated capital of the past, and even the anticipated earnings of the future. One of the greatest achievements, one of the greatest miracles ever wrought by credit, in my own judgment, is the simple credit unions which have been established in the continental countries of Europe. The Schultis system in the industrial centers enables men without business reputation, without commercial rating, without assets, to avail themselves of their potential credit. In Italy they have instituted a system of peoples' banks under which honor loans are made, made to men in the most necessitous circumstances, men who have no resources excepting the skill of their own hands and the honesty of their own hearts. The percentage of loss in these institutions has been remarkably low. It shows how human nature and human hearts respond to confidence, how trust inspires worthiness of trust, how faith begets fidelity. The weakest point in our own credit system is the want of some such system of rural credits to accommodate the farmers of our country. The farmer borrows money on short time and at high rates of interest, generally running from 5 to 10 years. He cannot pay the principal and interest of the loan out of the earnings of the farm during that period.

Such a system of farm financing is essentially, is fatally defective. We need a system of long-time loans at low rates of interest, with the amortization method of payments, such as has been established with such marked success in the continental countries of the Old World. But this problem is capable of solution; it will be solved. The more perplexing puzzle is the tenant farmer, the man without land, without home, without stock, without, in many instances, farm implements; without any dower, save his brain and brawn. My friends, I commend him to your consideration. He is entitled to the benefit of your experience and reflection. The man who devises a credit system that will meet his situation, that will vitalize his potential credit, will earn for himself a niche in that temple consecrated to the benefactors of mankind, alongside of Wallenburg and Luseti, the friends of the friendless in Italy. Not only is credit able to assist the poorest of the poor, the weakest of the weak to bear his burden with less difficulty, but it is sufficient to enable the strongest to bear their burdens with greater facility.

Let me illustrate. In the United States our stock of gold today aggregates $2,200,000,000. Our national indebtedness is equal to one-half the country's stock of gold. National, State, county, and municipal indebtedness in this country aggregates two and a half times the total gold supply. The bonded indebtedness of the railroads is five times this stock of gold. Private indebtedness, individual and corporate, excluding current accounts, is 19 times the entire gold supply of the entire United States. At the breaking out of the European war the public indebtedness of the 46 leading countries of the world aggregated $44,000,000,000, perhaps five times the entire stock of gold in all the civilized world. I say this to illustrate the strength, I might say the miraculous strength, of credit and of the existing credit systems throughout Christendom. This brings me to the consideration of the point so ably discussed and exhausted by Mr. Warburg. It is our ambition to become a creditor nation. This is not an unreasonable ambition. The United States has a right to aspire to become the financial premier in the financial federation of the world.

There are certain conditions which are essential to render any country a creditor nation. One of these is an accumulated stock of available capital. In addition to this, one or the other of the following conditions must obtain—either the resources of the lending country must be relatively well developed, as contrasted with the undeveloped resources of the borrowing country, or else the borrowing country must be driven by some imperious, some overpowering necessity, into the money market.

The United States is advancing credit or capital to the South American States because our resources are more fully developed than theirs. The United States is lending to the stricken nations of Europe because they are driven by uncompromising necessity into the borrowing market.

I might say this in passing, that Great Britain was the creditor nation of the world because she had a vast accumulation of capital, because her resources were relatively well developed in comparison with the young and developing countries of the globe. Not only that, but she maintained a system of free trade. I do not mean to introduce the tariff question here, but unless all nations are protected and other conditions are equal the country having the lowest tariff will have the greater advantage, because debtor nations will insist upon borrowing in those countries where a dollar's worth of their goods will pay a dollar's worth of their debts.

We reflect with some pride upon the fact that the American dollar has, at least temporarily, come to be the international unit of account. If we can perpetuate this policy it is, of course, desirable to do so. Perhaps it would foreclose forever the consideration of that question which was agitated some four or five decades ago—the question of an international unit or system of coinage; an international money of account; an international unit of value—I do not refer to bimetalism. It would of necessity be a gold coin and part of a decimal system. It is almost too much to hope that other nations will acquiesce in the acceptance of the American dollar as the standard of international commerce. The establishment of such a unit of value and money of account to measure international payments would greatly simplify political arithmetic and facilitate international exchange. I throw this out merely as a suggestion. It may be one of those elusive mirages of the financial desert, which we might pursue without overtaking unto the end of time.

The clearinghouse is one of the highest forms and phases of commercial evolution. I am not sure that the clearinghouse is not capable of development in two directions—in the direction of individual clearings. Such a system of clearings was of great consequence during the great commercial fairs of the later Middle Ages.

I do not mean to trek backward to the Middle Ages, but the experience of every time and of every clime should be made to shed its light upon the present and its problems. I am not sure that the clearinghouse is not capable of development in the direction of international clearings, the balancing of international debts, the cancellation of international credits. But this is merely another conundrum propounded by an amateur to an assemblage of experts.

These are some of the possibilities of the credit system. But the system, with all its advantages and possibilities, is not without its dangers. We have a rather complicated and intricate system of distribution. Some have characterized it as wasteful. There are two or three or four links in the chain of credit extending from the producer or the manufacturer, on the one hand, to the ultimate consumer upon the other. The risk increases with each additional link. Reducing the number of links would reduce the risk and would increase the security.

I commend this problem to your consideration because you credit men stand as sentinels and as guards to protect the rest of society against dangers of this description.

Confidence is the soul of credit, and when credit loses its soul evil may follow. I refer to speculation when it runs riot. Periods of excessive speculation seem to return in cycles. This is not a mere coincidence, not a mere matter of fortuitous chance, nor is it due, as Mr. Jevons contended, to the spots in the sun. [Laughter.] It is due to a deep-seated law of psychology, a deep-seated law of human nature, a disposition to buy upon a rising and to sell upon a falling market. Time being an element, these cycles come and go and come again. The credit man will be the first to scent the danger, and he should be the first to exhibit the danger signal and to warn society against evils of this description.

It cannot be unknown to you that there are those who have charged or feared the existence of a money trust or, to use a more fitting name, a credit monopoly in the United States. I need not say that such a trust, that such a monopoly, would be the worst possible form of monopoly or trust. Any man of character, of assets, with a reasonable prospect of success, has a right to credit without being obliged to consult his rival or competitor.

We ought to erect every safeguard against the establishment of a credit monopoly in the United States. We ought to insist upon the democratization of credit. To this end the Federal Reserve System has been instituted. It will serve and accomplish this end and it will also serve as a protection against the occurrence of crises and commercial panics.

The commercial panic or crisis is one of the dangers and disadvantages inseparable from a credit system. Gout is an infirmity of high life, and insanity is a disease of rational beings. Commercial crisis is one of the diseases, one of the dangers incident to a highly developed credit or commercial system.

Pardon the digression for a moment. Panics have come in all commercial countries, in all epochs of history.

There occurred a serious panic in Rome in the year 33 of the present era. That was the year of the Crucifixion. I allude to that merely as a coincidence. In the year 32 Seuthes & Son, leading merchants of Alexandria, failed. Their failure was due to the loss of three richly laden spice ships in a hurricane on the Red Sea. They had also suffered reverses in their caravan trade with Ethiopia, owing to the decline in the value of ivory and ostrich feathers. Soon afterward the firm of Marcus & Co., of Tyre, went into bankruptcy. Their failure was due to embezzlement on the part of a freedman manager and to a strike upon the part of certain of their Phoenician employees. They had obtained considerable credits from the banking firm of Quintus, Maximus & Lucius Vito, of Rome, situated on Via Sacra, the Wall Street of that ancient metropolis. [Laughter.] When it became noised abroad that this bank was involved, a run on the bank ensued.

This involved still another bank, that of the brothers Pettius. The two banks closed their doors on the same day. This was followed by another failure in Rome, by the failure of the leading bank in Carthage and the leading bank in Corinth, the failure of two banks in Lyons, and the failure of a bank in Byzantium, the modern Constantinople. The panic ran riot.

A courier was sent to Tiberius, then in his retreat at Capri, with a petition for relief. After 4 days the courier returned. The senate assembled post haste, and an immense crowd thronged the forum. It is said that millionaires and beggars jostled each other in their efforts to receive the tidings from the Emperor. Tiberius directed that 100,000,000 cesterces be taken from the public treasury and deposited with the embarrassed banks with directions that they lend to the neediest debtors on 3 years' time without interest, but upon double security.

This relieved the stringency, confidence returned, business was resumed. How like the daily dispatches of 1893 and 1907 read these passages from Tacitus and Suetonius. Every commercial country must calculate at least upon the possibility of commercial panics and crises.

Let me now speak briefly of the humanities of the commercial system. In ancient times the laws regulating the obligation between debtor and creditor were of the most rigorous character; they were severe; they were cruel. In Greece the creditor could sell his debtor and his family into slavery. That custom was abolished by Code Solon. Under the Roman law the creditor could not only sell his debtor into slavery but he had the power of life and death over an unfortunate debtor.

Imprisonment for debt prevailed in England until 1844. The first State to abolish that policy in the United States was that of Pennsylvania, in 1790. New York began its abolition in 1831, showing the progress of a more humane and enlightened spirit.

Bankruptcy laws had been extended in scope and humanized in their effects. The bankruptcy law has prevailed in England for more than three and a half centuries.

There have been four bankruptcy statutes in the United States; one in 1800, the next in 1841, the next in 1867, and the last in 1898. The statutes have undoubtedly oftentimes been used and abused as a refuge for undeserving and fraudulent debtors, and yet, after all, they have been a sort of legal and judicial answer to the prayer, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." They have said to the erring and unfortunate debtor in the language of the Nazarine, "Go and sin no more." Perhaps the first bankruptcy statute—or establishment, perhaps I had better say—was the great temple to Diana in the ancient city of Ephesus. The impecunious, the necessitous debtor who could find refuge in the precincts of this sanctuary was afforded protection against the wrath and vengeance of his pursuing creditors. It requires no prophet to tell or to foretell that we are coming upon better times; that, barring the European war, the commercial and industrial and financial progress of the world was never more promising. The morning star of a new time is already twinkling upon the brow of the eastern horizon.

My friends, the credit institution has done much to build up and confirm high ethical standards. It has done much to inculcate a sense of obligation and a feeling of responsibility.

I realize that we must insist upon honor for honor's sake; must insist upon honesty for honesty's sake; must insist upon conscience for conscience's sake; and yet those who enjoy the benefits of the credit system must realize that the confidence of their fellow man has other compensation than that of a conscience void of offense.

And the credit system, measuring those things that are permanent and those that are passing, must teach us all to believe that a good name is the immediate jewel of the soul.

My friends, I thank you.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate briefly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I believe it was the humorist Bill Nye, in one of his sage observations on the conduct of matters about a courthouse, who said that if you were about a courthouse you would be very apt to hear the loud and rasping filing of the charges, but you would have to listen very carefully to hear the soft quashing of the indictment. In other words, when the charges are made there is always a great hullabaloo; but when the facts are presented which avoid the charges or the charges are avoided we very seldom hear of it.

A few days ago a suit was brought by Mr. Hearst against the Lobby Committee and others; and the headlines of the newspapers screamed to the country that the "sacred liberties of the people" were about to be violated, and that these committees and representatives of the people in Washington were "running roughshod over the rights of the people" and were "rifling the private papers of the people" contrary to the Constitution. A great ado was made about it in all the newspapers throughout the land, and since that time Members have risen upon the floor of the Senate and have cited authority to the effect that the committee was violating the fundamental rights of the people of this country. But not a single authority cited by those who rose on the other side of the aisle to take such a position held to be illegal such conduct on the part of any parliamentary or legislative body throughout the country. Never was authority cited that a legislative body or a parliamentary body pursuing the procedure that the Black committee had been pursuing had violated anybody's fundamental rights.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] took the floor and cited the authorities, many of them, poured them into the Record, to the effect that for a hundred years legislative bodies on this side of the Capitol and the other had been pursuing the same procedure that the Black committee had been pursuing, and no one had seriously raised the question about constitutional rights.

But the question was raised by Mr. Hearst in the name of the Constitution, in the name of our ancient liberties, in the name of the freedom of the press. He would not know the Goddess of Liberty if she came down off her pedestal in New York Harbor and bowed to him. He would probably try to get her telephone number. [Laughter.] He would not know the freedom of the press if it sprang full panoplied from the Constitution in front of him. He is the greatest menace to the freedom of the press that exists in this country, because instead of using the great chain of newspapers that he owns, and the magazines, and the news-disseminating agencies of the country that he controls, to disseminate the truth to the people, he prostitutes them to the propaganda that pursues the policy he dictates.

And so, gentlemen of the Senate—I was about to make a campaign speech here, and I do not know but that it is a good subject sometime to make one on, and I may do it—what I desire to say to you today is that this "freedom of the press" which has been talked about so loudly by Mr. Hearst is not being threatened by the Black committee. Nobody's fundamental rights are being invaded by that committee. No one's sacred private rights have been pried into by that committee; and no person has come here or has gone elsewhere and said that his sacred rights had been denied or had been invaded by that committee.

Who cries out in the name of liberty? Who cries out in the name of the freedom of the press? Only Mr. Hearst—only Mr. Hearst; but he raises such a hullabaloo about it that he does attract the attention of other people.

Of course, I should not expect Mr. Hearst to take any cognizance of what I shall say here today. I should not expect him to pay any attention to the facts I shall call to the attention of the Senate. I do not expect to find in his newspapers any reference at all to the facts I shall call to your attention. Mr. Hearst does not run his newspapers that way. He does not want the people to have the facts. He has a peculiar code of ethics for himself. He runs his newspapers on the same high plane on which he runs his private life.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection to any statement the Senator may make; but he referred just now to a citizen of my State, and made, I think, a very unhappy personal reference. I presume the Senator does not wish that to be included in the RECORD.

Mr. MINTON. I have nothing to take back. I thought the gentleman to whom I referred lived in California. I seem to remember, though, that the tax laws out there did not suit this great taxpayer and Budget balancer, so he went to New York.

But the things to which I direct the attention of the Senate today I mention for its benefit, and for the benefit of the country, and for the benefit of those who represent the press of the country that wishes to take to the people the truth and the facts; so I shall expect that that part of the press which does not pursue the policies of Mr. Hearst will take some cognizance of the facts I call to the attention of the Senate today.

When this hullabaloo was going on about the invasion of constitutional rights, and so much noise was stirred up about the matter, it attracted the attention of the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; and he submitted in the Senate, on March 9, a resolution directed to the Federal Communications Commission, asking that body to furnish the Senate with a report showing by what authority they were examining telegrams in the telegraph offices, and who put them to work. Within a week the Federal Communications Commission submitted to the Senate of the United States a written report, and on the 17th day of March that report was printed and laid upon the desk of every Senator here. Nothing was said about it. The facts were recited in the report; and this "dark, deep conspiracy" that Mr. Hearst has been talking about in his newspapers was dissipated by the facts. They were facts of record that could have been discovered by Mr. Hearst and his minions if they had taken the trouble to try to find out the truth; but they did not do that. They were facts of record in the office of the Federal Communications Commission.

They showed that when the Black committee was holding forth here last year it developed the facts—undisputed; never denied by anybody; facts which could not be denied—that hundreds—yes, thousands—of telegrams had been sent to Washington which bore the names of people who did not send them or authorize them to be sent; that thousands of telegrams had been forged; that in many instances the records had been destroyed by the telegraph companies themselves. These facts were brought to the attention of the Federal Communications Commission in the newspapers and by the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, to the effect that this condition existed widely over the country; and the Federal Communications Commission, under section 220 (c) of the Federal Communications Act, as set forth in this report, proceeded to an investigation on their own, because this provision of the statute gave them access to all of the records of these communication companies. So, with access to these records, the Communications Commission conceived it to be their duty to find out how many telegrams had been forged, and to advise Congress about legislation along that line, because apparently there is no legislation against the forging of telegrams. There is legislation which makes it an offense to destroy the records of a telegraph company before a certain period of time has elapsed, and the record before the Black committee establishing clearly that the records had been destroyed by the telegraph companies within the time they were supposed to be preserved under the law, the Communications Commission sent their representatives, under a resolution adopted by the Federal Communications Commission, without any suggestion from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] or any member of his committee, to the telegraph companies to conduct an investigation of their own to determine whether or not these telegrams had been forged and to what extent, to determine whether or not records had been destroyed and to what extent, and to determine a number of other things with reference to the conduct of their business, over which the Communications Commission had ample authority.

These representatives of the Communications Commission went to the telegraph companies and there found the representatives of the Black committee, acting under subpoena, examining telegrams which they wanted to see; and, working in cooperation with the Black committee, but not under their direction or supervision, they handled the same telegrams once, rather than have the Black committee take them out and examine them and put them back and then have the Communications Commission take them out and put them back. Cooperating, they used the same space and handled the same telegrams in the interest of the business organization of the telegraph companies themselves.

If the statements contained in the papers were to be believed, one would think that we entered into a great, dark, deep conspiracy with the Federal Communications Commission to go to the telegraph companies and rifle the files, and do something we had no authority to do. As a matter of fact, the Federal Communications Commission was proceeding under its own authority and on its own initiative, doing the things it had a lawful right to do. We were pursuing our own way, under our own authority, and under subpoenas sent out by the committee. It just happened that the representatives of both organizations were at the same time working together, cooperating in handling the same communications.

The papers carried the story, and broadcast it, that the Federal Communications Commission was putting a lot of people to work in the telegraph offices digging among these telegrams. What are the facts? The report shows that for 114 days, counting Sundays—I did not take the time to take out the Sundays and holidays—there was one representative of the Federal Communications Commission at the telegraph offices. For 39 days they had two people in the telegraph offices.

So, Mr. President, instead of there being a conspiracy on the part of the Senate committee and the Federal Communications Commission, the fact is that there was not any conspiracy, and the Commission was proceeding in its own way, under its own authority, on its own initiative, and the Black committee was doing the same.

These are the facts, and I hope that they will be carried to the country with the same publicity and the same attention given to the charges as was manifested in the beginning.

THE CALENDAR—BILLS PASSED OVER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar is in order, and the clerk will state the first bill in order on the calendar.

The bill (S. 944) to amend section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act was announced as first in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 213) to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909, 35 Stat. 1109 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 203), and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DUFFY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1506) to change the name of the Pickwick Landing Dam to Quin Dam was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 574) relative to Members of Congress acting as attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 509) to prevent the use of Federal offices or patronage in elections and to prohibit Federal officeholders from misuse of positions of public trust for private and partisan ends was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 24) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1452) providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporters in the executive branch of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 87) to prevent the shipment in interstate commerce of certain articles and commodities, in connection with which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day, and prescribing certain conditions with respect to purchases and loans by the United States, and codes, agreements, and licenses under the National Industrial Recovery Act, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADJUSTMENT OF LOSSES OF COOPERATIVE MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) for the adjustment and settlement of losses sustained by the cooperative marketing associations was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is a joint resolution I introduced some time ago. The purpose was to allow certain cooperative farm organizations to come before the Farm Credit Administration, and it authorized the Farm Credit Administration to discuss certain matters with the cooperatives and to pay claims, if they felt that the cooperative organizations were entitled to such payments under the old Farm Board set-up. When the measure came before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry it included only wheat.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have offered objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. FRAZIER. Will not the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. KING. Yes; but I shall insist on it when the Senator concludes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to explain the matter briefly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator making a statement in regard to the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, when the joint resolution was before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry it covered only wheat. It was suggested by some of those interested in cotton that cotton should also be included, and that was done. There has been some objection, principally from the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], in regard to cotton being included in the joint resolution. The Senator from Tennessee has told me repeatedly that he would have no objection to the joint resolution if cotton were eliminated from it. So during the past few weeks the president of the Wheat Growers Association of North Dakota, who is interested in this measure especially, has gotten in touch with the cotton cooperatives and succeeded in getting them to give their approval to eliminating cotton from the joint resolution, stating that if they felt later on that they should have a similar joint resolution adopted they could have it introduced in their own interest.

I have a letter from Mr. Duis, under date of March 24, which I received this morning, in which he states:

We, of course, have authority from Mr. Henry and the cotton people to strike out cotton.

Mr. President, I feel that this is a just measure. The wheat cooperatives were advised and urged by the Farm Board to withhold their grain in their own elevators, keeping it off the market in order to promote the orderly marketing scheme of the Farm Board. It was held off the market, and the wheat growers of North Dakota, Montana, Minnesota, and South Dakota claim that they lost, in round figures, $600,000 by obeying and cooperating with the Farm Board. They feel they are entitled to consideration and entitled to go before the Farm Credit Administration and have an adjustment made.

Mr. President, I hope this measure may be passed, as I believe it is a just one. It has been on the calendar a long time. I wish to amend the joint resolution by striking out "cotton" wherever it appears, so that the joint resolution will provide only for wheat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution. It does not occur to me that there should be discrimination between cotton producers and wheat growers who are in an identical relationship to the subject matter of the proposed legislation. In view of the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, however, that the heads of the cooperative associations whose organizations are directly concerned have consented to the amendment which he suggests, I shall not object.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Arkansas that there is no intention on my part, and I assume no intention on the part of others interested in the joint resolution in behalf of wheat, to discriminate against the cotton cooperatives in any way, and I, for one, will be perfectly willing and glad to help the cotton cooperatives if they wish to introduce a joint resolution later on.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, several years ago facts were brought to the attention of the Senate and were discussed, showing a close cooperation between many of these cooperatives, both those interested in cotton and those interested in wheat, with the Farm Board, and such a cooperation as did not, as I recall the facts, warrant any consideration being given to the so-called cooperatives of the character indicated by the Senator. I shall be glad to confer with him and advise him of the facts which have come to my attention; but for the present I desire that the measure go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

STANDARDS FOR FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CONTAINERS

The bill (S. 1460) to fix standards for till baskets, climax baskets, round stave baskets, market baskets, drums, hampers, cartons, crates, boxes, barrels, and other containers for fruits or vegetables, to consolidate existing laws on this subject, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill has been on the calendar for almost a year. Upon previous calls of the calendar, under an order similar to that under which we are now proceeding, objections have been made to the consideration of the bill. I should like to ask if some member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or the author of the bill, can give the Senate an explanation of the measure.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this bill was introduced at the request of the Department of Agriculture. It merely proposes to codify the existing laws with respect to standards for all containers of fresh fruits and vegetables, and likewise to prevent the sale of fruits or vegetables in closed packages unless the exact contents are clearly stated on the outside of the package. The purpose of the bill is to prevent the public from being misled as to the quantity that is contained in closed packages containing fruits or vegetables which are offered for sale.

I have no personal interest in the bill, except that I think it is a good bill, introduced at the request of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the bill compel the labeling of the packages and containers so as to indicate the quantity, or does it simply provide that where they are labeled they must be truthfully labeled?

Mr. BYRD. The bill not only provides that they shall be truthfully labeled but also that when the contents are in a closed package, the package shall be labeled on the outside as to the contents thereof, so as to protect the public.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia will pardon me for asking whether the bill would prevent him from shipping some of his splendid apples from Virginia to the District of Columbia in an open container, or in any kind of container he desires to use.

Mr. BYRD. It would not. I will say to the Senator that the bill would require that the exact contents of a closed package be marked on the outside of the package.

Mr. KING. Would the bill compel farmers who bring in their products from Maryland and from Virginia, potatoes and other vegetables of all kinds, or who send them in, to go to the trouble and expense of obtaining containers of the character approved by the Department of Agriculture? Would the farmers have to label the containers in the way indicated?

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that the Department of Agriculture has already approved a large number of containers which are to be legalized by this bill; and, as I have said, the bill requires only that the shipper mark the contents of the container when it is a closed package. If the shipment is made in an open package, such marking is not required.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I regret the necessity for asking that the bill go over, but I shall have to do so. My colleague [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] has objected to the bill a number of times heretofore, and I now ask that it go over.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. POPE. Sometime ago an objection to this bill was filed by some of the fruit growers in the Northwest; and, as I understood the Senator from Virginia, such objection had been removed or would be removed by an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BYRD. The bill does not in any way affect the shipment of fruit from the West; but the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] has objected to it. He apparently is not satisfied with the explanation made by the Department of Agriculture. In my judgment, the bill does not in any way influence or affect the shipment of fruit from the West.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made, and the bill will be passed over.

REFINANCING OF AGRICULTURAL INDEBTEDNESS

The bill (S. 212) to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest by establishing an efficient credit system, through the use of the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Reserve Banking System, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to inquire from the majority leader when we may expect to have this bill taken up for discussion and consideration by the Senate. The bill has been on the calendar since May 7 of last year, and an unsuccessful attempt has been made to get before the House of Representatives a similar bill, a companion bill. It has been lost there.

I think everyone knows something of the history of the measure. It provides for giving the farmers a lower rate of interest and easier payments, in order to save their homes and farms. I think the measure is a very worthy one. A number of farm organizations have favored it and have memorialized Congress to pass the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from North Dakota, I will state that I am unable to give him the information for which he calls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1476) to provide for unemployment relief through development of mineral resources; to assist the development of privately owned mineral claims; to provide for the development of emergency and deficiency minerals; and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 476) relating to promotion of civil-service employees was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1952) extending the classified executive civil service of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2405) to provide for a special clerk and liaison officer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDALS, ETC., BY OFFICERS OF THE NAVY, ETC.

The bill (S. 1975) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy, and officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps, to accept such medals, orders, diplomas, decorations, and photographs as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to explain the bill very briefly.

Further on in the calendar there is a bill authorizing the President to bestow an honor upon two officers of the British Navy who succeeded in saving the personnel of the U. S. S. Fulton, which ship was destroyed by fire at sea. From time to time various governments of the world bestow rewards or honors or medals upon those in the service of the army or navy of other countries who do heroic things. This bill gives the authority of Congress to the reception of such honors by American officers and enlisted men in the Navy and the Marine Corps to whom foreign governments desire to show their appreciation of heroic actions performed for the benefit of the citizens of those countries.

Bills of this kind from time to time are passed by the Senate, usually only one bill at the time; but the Navy Department, rather than have a large number of private bills, has bulked together all those who have been offered these medals and honors, and they are named in the bill which is now pending.

It seems to me the bill ought to be enacted without opposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-named officers of the United States Navy, and officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps, are hereby authorized to accept such medals, orders, diplomas, decorations, and photographs as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered:

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 916) to carry into effect the decision of the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in French spoliation was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2583) establishing certain commodity divisions in the Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 379) to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2998) to control the trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war was announced as next in order.
Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1632) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by water carriers operating in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BONE. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2825) to provide for the establishment of a National Planning Board and the organization and functions thereof was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for just a moment?

This measure was introduced by the Senator from Michigan (Mr. VANDENBERG). In my judgment, the bill is of great national interest. It has to do with the continuation of the Resources Board, which has been in operation for several years. It has to do with the determination of natural resources in this country which we might utilize, instead of importing them from abroad—the mineral resources, the timber resources, the chemical resources.

I realize that the situation now is such that on the Consent Calendar we could hardly do anything with the bill; but I am convinced that at some time or other this bill should receive the serious consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3072) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2665) to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN CRIMINALS

The bill (S. 2969) to authorize the deportation of criminals, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask that that bill go over. I understood that was the bill which was called a few minutes ago, but evidently I was mistaken, as the previous bill was Order of Business 881, being Senate bill 379. I have no objection to that bill, and the objection to it was made inadvertently.

Mr. COPELAND. I object to Senate bill 379.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think they are different bills.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as to Calendar No. 1210, Senate bill 2969, let me say that there have been several hearings since it was last considered by the Senate, and that the bill is now presented with amendments which make it more acceptable than heretofore. I am embarrassed by the fact that, because of other duties, I was not in attendance upon those meetings, and the chairman of the committee is not now present.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps the Senator from Utah can explain the situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is accurate in stating that there have been hearings since the bill now on the calendar was reported. At those hearings a number of amendments to the bill were suggested and were tentatively agreed upon by Members who were present. Unfortunately, the chairman of the committee, the junior Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. COOLIDGE), is absent. I told him that I would try to have the bill acted upon at an early date.

The amendments which were tendered, and which were tentatively accepted by the members of the committee present, were ordered to be printed; a blueprint has been made, and it is my intention to call the committee together this week and see if we cannot agree upon a bill and report it for prompt consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Just a sentence further and then I will yield. The bill ought to be passed for the reason that, aside from the hardships that are involved with respect to about 2,800 persons, there are 20,000 alien criminals in the United States who ought to be deported, but who may not be deported because of existing law. The bill which is before the committee, with the amendments which have been agreed upon, if enacted, will permit and compel the deportation of those 20,000. I now yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill has been several times called for consideration in the Senate and objections to its consideration have been made. It is my information that the amendments which have been proposed and, as the Senator from Utah says, tentatively accepted by the committee remove the material objections which have been urged against the bill.

No Senator wants to preserve a protected status for alien criminals, and the primary purpose of the proposed legislation is to prevent that situation, although there are other important provisions of the bill. I am hopeful that the committee may submit its report and that those who are interested in the subject matter may familiarize themselves with it, to the end that the bill may be brought forward in due course.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall ask consideration tomorrow of the bill, and, in the meantime, as soon as the Senate adjourns this afternoon I shall ask the members of the committee to meet.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that it would be well to report the bill with amendments, so that Senators who are interested in the subject may have the opportunity before it is taken up of familiarizing themselves with the amendments?

Mr. KING. My intention was, if possible, to report the bill this afternoon with amendments, and have it printed so that Senators might have full opportunity to consider it at the next session of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the purpose of the bill is to remove certain inequalities that are now in the law concerning the separation of families, and the next important matter is to deal with criminal aliens. It seems to me that, if such is the purpose of the bill, it ought to be enacted at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator. The primary purpose is deportation—it is a deportation bill—we want to get rid of 20,000 aliens who are criminals. That is the primary purpose of that measure I wish to emphasize, and the secondary purpose is to care for a number of unfortunate cases involving persons who would be subject to deportation but as to whom there are equities that ought to weigh in their behalf so that they may be permitted to remain in the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Those exceptional cases involve three or four thousand children, who would be left here without their parents if the law were carried out.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, we may disagree as to the primary purposes of the bill, but the Committee on Immigration has given the bill hearings, and it appears that it will be wholly possible to work out a measure acceptable to practically all the members of the committee, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Utah if it is his desire to have the bill recommended to the committee?

Mr. KING. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently said: Mr. President, may I have the attention of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]? As I understood, a few moments ago the Senator said that if the Coolidge bill with amendments were passed, the Secretary of Labor then would have power to deport some 20,000 criminal aliens. Did I correctly understand the Senator?

Mr. KING. I stated a few moments ago, when a measure was reached on the calendar—the so-called immigration bill, though it is really a deportation bill—that the information before the committee, which came from Mr. MacCormack and Mr. Shaughnessy, was that under that bill, if it should be enacted into law, at least 20,000 aliens who are criminals and who ought to be deported would be deported, and that under the present law they could not be deported. The bill has gone over, however; so it is not before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the Senator in mind the proposed legislation which the Commissioner of Immigration has recommended should be passed?

Mr. KING. I have that in mind; and I based my statement in part upon the statement of Mr. MacCormack, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization; the statement of Mr. Shaughnessy, the Deputy Commissioner; and the recommendation of the Department of Labor.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator place those hearings in the RECORD today, so that we may be able to study them?

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to do so if they have been printed. I presume they have been printed, although I have not seen them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the hearings have been printed it is not necessary to have them published in the RECORD. The hearings might be very voluminous and very expensive to publish in the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not mean to have the complete hearings published in the RECORD, but that part of them to which the Senator called my attention, saying that we should amend the present immigration laws to enable the authorities to carry out purposes already covered by legislation.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that the bill as it is upon the calendar was not satisfactory to some members of the committee. Thereupon the chairman of the committee called the committee together for the purpose of considering the views that might be expressed by members of the committee. Thereupon representatives of the Department of Labor, including Mr. MacCormack and Mr. Shaughnessy, came before the committee and gave their testimony. That testimony was taken down in shorthand and has been printed, as I assume; and I shall be glad to see that the Senator from Pennsylvania has copies of all the testimony given at the hearings before the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I distinctly recall that a statement issued by Mr. MacCormack himself, about the time of the hearings, which goes into the subject fully, explains the necessity for the enactment of the legislation and discusses some of the amendments that were proposed.

Mr. KING. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania can easily procure that statement.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that it is not necessary for any legislation to be enacted in order to deport any criminal alien, or any alien who is now here illegally.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in reply to that statement I may say that the Senator takes a position in opposition to that taken by the Secretary of Labor, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, and the counselors of both those officials. They point out wherein the present law is defective. They disclose the reasons why a large number of criminal aliens cannot be deported.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I take issue with the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization; and, as I understand now from the Senator from Utah, who is a member of the committee, they have withdrawn the bill, and have offered certain amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator is mistaken about that. The bill has not been withdrawn. At the instance of a number of Senators, hearings were held, and some amendments have been tentatively agreed to. The bill has gone over, and all this discussion is out of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to answer the Senator by saying that at least it caused the Senate Committee on Immigration to hold further hearings on the bill to listen to the protests of the labor groups that are under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor, and the patriotic societies of the country.

Mr. KING. The organizations referred to have been heard, and the matter closed; and I object to further consideration of it at this time.

Mr. DAVIS. But had we gone on and considered the bill and passed it, the people to whom the Senator has just referred would not have been heard. They desired to state their objections.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1826) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service to include employees in the legislative branch was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS UNDER CIVIL-SERVICE LAW

The bill (S. 3160) to amend the law relating to residence requirements of applicants for examinations before the Civil Service Commission, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. BULOW. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection if the Senator from South Dakota desires to explain the measure.

Mr. BULOW. Mr. President, this bill was introduced at the suggestion of the Civil Service Commission. All that it proposes is to fix the residence requirement in the case of persons who are appointed in the apportioned departmental service in the District of Columbia. The residence requirement is made 1 year instead of 6 months. When the census law of 1929 was enacted it repealed the law of 1919, requiring a year's residence, and there is some uncertainty about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the present law provides a 6 months' residence requirement?

Mr. BULOW. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the passage of this bill would extend it—

Mr. BULOW. To 1 year.

Mr. McKELLAR. To 1 year. The committee thought that the time ought to be extended from 6 months to 1 year?

Mr. BULOW. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I, too, think so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3160) to amend the law relating to residence requirements of applicants for examinations before the Civil Service Commission was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of the second paragraph under the caption "Civil Service Commission" in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes", approved July 11, 1890, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Hereafter every application for examination before the Civil Service Commission for appointment in the departmental service in the District of Columbia shall be accompanied by a certificate of an officer, with his official seal attached, of the county and State of which the applicant claims to be a citizen, that such applicant was, at the time of making such application, a legal or voting resident of said county, and had been such resident for a period of not less than 1 year next preceding, but this provision shall not apply to persons who may be in the service and seek promotion or appointment in other branches of the Government."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid in national defense, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AIR TRANSPORTATION IN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

The bill (S. 3420) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I presume that bill had better go over. Its author is ill, and it appears to be a measure of considerable importance.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in connection with Senate bill 3420, while I think the suggestion that the bill go over is wise, yet I feel impelled to tell the Senate that the Committee on Safety in the Air is in process of formulating legislation which it thinks will go along the lines suggested by the bill which has just been called. So nothing has been lost with regard to safety, I am sure, by deferring action on the bill for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3393) to create a Federal Board of Foreign Trade was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

REGULATION OF TRANSACTIONS ON GRAIN EXCHANGES

The bill (H. R. 6772) to amend the Grain Futures Act to prevent and remove obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grains and other commodities by regulating transactions therein on commodity futures exchanges, to limit or abolish short selling, to curb manipulation, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the able Senator from Arkansas, and express to him the hope that at some date not far remote we may be able to consider the bill under a special order or have it made the unfinished business. It is a bill that has the support, I think, of all the cooperative organizations and farm groups in the country. I have had many personal appeals made to me, I have received a great many letters relative to the measure, and I am exceedingly anxious for the time to come, and that at a very early date, when the bill may be made the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I concur in the opinion that the bill should be taken up for consideration; and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to proceed to its consideration at any time. There have been some delays, to my regret, due to controversies growing out of amendments that were reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I shall be glad to cooperate to secure consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I knew that would be the answer of the Senator from Arkansas, and I appreciate his feeling of friendliness toward the measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if he is aware of any protest as to the measure coming from Chicago or institutions such as the Board of Trade of Chicago?

Mr. McNARY. No; I am not; but I would expect an objection from that quarter would be forthcoming. That, however, does not deter me in my desire to see the proposed legislation enacted.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not deny that my interest depends on the quantity and quality of support the measure may afford in the coming senatorial election. [Laughter.] In the meantime, I am content to have adopted the course agreed upon by the able leader of this side of the Chamber and the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I have talked to a number of Senators from western States who are interested in this bill; some conferences have been held among them, and they are very anxious that the bill be taken up as soon as possible. I have also talked with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; I think I will hear from him within the next few hours and that he will agree to withdraw the amendments which I think have caused the delay.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I myself have discussed that subject with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I am satisfied that the withdrawal of the amendment which the Senator has in mind will facilitate a prompt disposition of the bill. Such action was suggested by myself to the Senator from South Carolina some weeks ago, and I understood he was considering the suggestion favorably, but I have not been advised as to his conclusions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DESIGNATION OF BUREAU OF NAVIGATION AND STEAMBOAT INSPECTION

The bill (H. R. 8599) to provide for a change in the designation of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, to create a marine casualty investigation board, and increase efficiency in administration of the steamboat-inspection laws, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill, as will be observed, has been on the calendar since August last. It was objected to for a long time by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. He has now withdrawn his objection. The Committee on Commerce, however, desires to offer certain amendments, and it would be very desirable, in my opinion, if the bill could be passed. It has to do with the inspection of vessels as to safety, to make certain that disasters such as the Mohawk and Morro Castle disasters may not again occur so far as we can prevent them by inspections and care. So I hope the Senate will accord the bill a few moments so that it may be passed with the amendments desired by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments offered by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 1, after the words "civil service", it is proposed to strike out "rules and regulations" and in lieu thereof to insert "laws or the Classification Act of 1925, as amended."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to give it again. I fear the Senator was not listening.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not, and I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. COPELAND. The Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection has to do with the inspection of ships as to their safety. There are certain defects in the law which have been made manifest by recent disasters, such as those which befell the Morro Castle and the Mohawk. It was deemed necessary that there should be a revision of the law. The Committee on Commerce has a special committee investigating safety at sea, and in connection with that there is a distinguished voluntary group headed by Admiral Rock that has gone into these matters with great care.

Mr. McKELLAR. It applies to the safety of vessels at sea and makes the safeguards greater?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is the Senator referring to the measure to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La FOLLETTE] has previously objected?

Mr. COPELAND. He formerly objected to it. The Senator from Utah has in mind the next bill on the calendar, which the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to have go over, but he has withdrawn all objections to the pending bill.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether Andrew Furuseth has withdrawn his objections?

Mr. COPELAND. It was because of his objections that the Senator from Wisconsin asked to have the bill go over, but those objections have all been withdrawn.

Mr. KING. If Mr. Furuseth is favorable, I have no objection. I say that because of his great knowledge of all marine questions.

Mr. COPELAND. I hold him in the same high esteem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment offered by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 2, line 25, after the word "Commerce", to insert "without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1925, as amended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 8, to strike out:

(b) For the purpose of investigating marine casualties not involving loss of life and all cases of acts of incompetency or misconduct or any act in violation of any of the provisions of this title, or of any of the regulations issued thereunder, committed by any licensed officer or holder of a certificate of service while acting under the authority of his license or certificate of service, whether or not any of such acts are committed in connection with any marine casualty, the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is hereby authorized and directed to appoint marine boards, each consisting of two principal traveling inspectors and a supervising inspector of the said Bureau.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(b) The Secretary of Commerce shall establish rules and regulations for the investigation of marine casualties and accidents not involving loss of life, any act in violation of any of the provisions of this title or of any of the regulations issued thereunder, and all cases of acts of incompetency or misconduct committed by any licensed officer or holder of a certificate of service while acting under the authority of his license or certificate of service, whether or not any of such acts are committed in connection with any marine casualty or accident. The Secretary of Commerce shall classify marine casualties and accidents not involving loss of life according to the gravity thereof, and in making such classification the Secretary shall give consideration to the extent of injuries to persons, the extent of property damage, the dangers actual or potential which such marine casualties or accidents may create to the safety of navigation of commerce. All such marine casualties or accidents classified as serious shall be investigated by a marine board appointed by the Secretary of Commerce consisting of two principal traveling inspectors and a supervising inspector of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. Marine casualties or accidents classified as less serious shall be investigated by a marine board consisting of representatives of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation designated by the director thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York what expense will be involved and how it will be borne?

Mr. COPELAND. There will not be any added expense.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice there is no authorization for an appropriation in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. The bill provides for a reorganization of the Bureau, and does not involve money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 5, to strike out:

(d) Immediately after the occurrence of a marine casualty the appropriate board shall conduct an investigation into any acts of incompetency or misconduct or any acts in violation of any of the provisions of this title, or of any of the regulations issued thereunder, committed by any licensed officer acting under authority of his license, or by any chief or assistant steward, purser, or radio operator acting under authority of a certificate of service issued to him by the board of local inspectors of steam vessels, or by any seaman; and into all circumstances surrounding such marine casualty, and shall determine, so far as possible, the cause of such casualty, the persons responsible therefor, and whether or not United States Government employees charged with the inspection of the vessel or vessels involved and with the examination and licensing of the officers thereof have properly performed their duties in connection with such inspection, examination, and licensing.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(d) All acts in violation of any of the provisions of this title or of any of the regulations issued thereunder, whether or not committed in connection with any marine casualty or accident, and all acts of incompetency or misconduct, whether or not committed in connection with any marine casualty or accident, committed by any licensed officer acting under authority of his license or by any chief or assistant steward, purser, radio operator, electrician, able seaman, or lifeboatman acting under authority of a certificate of service issued to him by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and all marine casualties and accidents and the attendant circumstances shall be immediately investigated by the appropriate board as provided in subsection (b) of this section. Such board shall determine, as far as possible, the cause of any such casualty or accident, the persons responsible therefor, and whether or not United States Government employees charged with the inspection of the vessel or the vessels involved and with the examination and licensing of the officers thereof have properly performed their duties in connection with such inspection, examination, and licensing. In all investigations conducted under the authority of this section a full and complete record of the facts and circumstances shall be submitted to the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I notice that the provisions include infractions of regulations as well as of law. Is there another section of the bill which imposes penalties or fines or imprisonment for violation of regulations?

Mr. COPELAND. There are certain fines imposed under the law, such as for violation of a regulation that davits must be installed in a given position on a given ship.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think the bill ought to provide punishment for violations of regulations. I notice the amendment does include regulations. I think the law ought not to provide for fining anyone or putting him in jail for violating regulations. We ought not to make criminals out of men who merely violate regulations. If they violate the law, they ought to be punished.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to make clear to the Senator that it would not be possible to write into the law all the regulations necessary for the safety of ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I appreciate that.

Mr. COPELAND. We could not incorporate regulations as to how the davits should be placed, how the lifeboats should be placed, how the smoke devices to obviate sparks should be placed, how many life preservers there should be, and so forth. Such matters are covered by regulations laid down by the Bureau of Navigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 11, line 5, after the word "vessels", to insert "except as far as existing law places definite responsibility on the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 18, after the word "duty" and the period, to strike out "The said extra compensation for overtime services shall be paid by the master, owner, or agent of such vessel to the" and insert "A fee of $25, for each 8 hours or fraction thereof that an inspector is engaged for overtime, holiday, or Sunday work, shall be paid by the master, owner, or agent of the vessel to the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 11, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 9. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York if the bill is now to go over?

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator refer to Calendar No. 1518, being Senate bill 2003?

Mr. GIBSON. I refer to House bill 8599.

Mr. COPELAND. Senate bill 2003 has gone over repeatedly, first on objection of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and later on my own objection, because the technical committee which is engaged in examining the matters involved has not as yet completed its work. It has done so insofar as the pending bill is concerned. I think, in the interest of safety, we should have action immediately taken on the bill now before the Senate. That does not mean we are not going to consider further measures of safety, but the pending bill, if enacted, will fill a gap and will assuredly provide greater safety at sea.

Mr. GIBSON. I had intended to offer some amendments, but not expecting the bill would come up today I am not prepared to do so now.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. I suggest that we complete the committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection to the bill going over so the Senator from Vermont may offer his amendments. I ask that the bill be reprinted as amended today so the Senate may have a clearer understanding of it when the Senator from Vermont presents his amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2003) to amend section 13 of the act of March 4, 1915, entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea", was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that bill go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to say once more regarding Senate bill 2003 that I am going to ask to have it go over because the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to have some further time to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3646) to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes", was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] asked me to object to this bill. He desires to have more time to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that bill cannot be disposed of under this order. It will require considerable time for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

STANISLAUS LIPOWICZ

The bill (H. R. 762) for the relief of Stanislaus Lipowicz was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. D. HENION, HARRY WOLFE, AND R. W. M'SORLEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3184) for the relief of H. D. Henion, Harry Wolfe, and R. W. McSorley.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I call the attention of the committee to the report of the Forest Supervisor, which, if accurate, would scarcely warrant the appropriation which is called for.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I make a statement regarding the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. Yes; I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BONE. The persons who are named as beneficiaries of the bill are three young men who were injured in an explosion caused by blasting operations on a road in Rainier National Forest in the State of Washington.

In the Seventy-second Congress a bill was introduced, with the assent and approbation of the Department of Agriculture, which carried nearly $8,000 for these boys. One of them had a foot very badly injured. It will be observed that the bill provides only $100 for one claimant and $100 for another. The car in which they were riding was damaged, and they were badly banged up. One of the boys had a seriously injured ankle; and it was deemed desirable, as the report indicates, that the injured man be given the benefits that would naturally accrue to him under the Employees' Compensation Act.

The injury was not the fault of the boys. The Department admits its negligence. It would seem to be almost gross negligence. The claim apparently has been reduced from somewhere around $8,000 to $2,500. The Department has approved it. The bill has passed the House; and it would seem that the amount provided is not excessive compensation for a young fellow whose ankle probably is liable to give him trouble all the rest of his life.

Mr. KING. My attention was attracted to the report of the forest supervisor, who states that he interviewed the occupants of the car following the accident, that they were examined by local physicians, and that they apparently had sustained only minor cuts and bruises, the most severe being a sprained ankle suffered by Mr. Henion.

From the statement made by the forest supervisor I felt justified in calling the attention of the Senate to the matter; but, in view of the statement of the Senator from Washington, I withdraw any objection.

Mr. BONE. So that the Senator's mind may be easy, I merely call his attention to the statement by Mr. Dunlap, Acting Secretary of Agriculture, where he refers to the more serious character of the injury which afterward developed.

Mr. KING. Very well.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MR. AND MRS. A. S. MULL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8069) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Mull, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000 to Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Mull in full compensation for personal injuries sustained by them as the result of an accident involving a Government truck, operated in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps, near Ringgold, Ga., on February 22, 1934: Provided,

That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

LEON FREDERICK RUGGLES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6297) for the relief of Leon Frederick Ruggles, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Leon Frederick Ruggles the sum of $563.47 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for medical and hospital expenses incurred by him as a result of an emergency operation: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

WILLIAM H. CLINTON

The bill (H. R. 3604) to place William H. Clinton on the retired list of the Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I notice that the Department opposes this measure.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the bill seems to be in charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to it at the request of the Senator from Utah. Personally I am not familiar with the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over, in view of the adverse report by the Department of the Navy, which appears on page 4 of the committee report in the following language:

In view of the above, the Navy Department recommends against the enactment of the bill H. R. 1845.

Mr. WALSH. I regret that I am not informed about the bill and that it will have to go over until I can inform myself about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being heard, the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2883) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this bill cannot be disposed of under the present order. I have conferred with the majority leader regarding the bill, and it is desirable to have it go over until a future date. I should like to have the bill go over without prejudice, because it is an important measure, and I expect to bring it up at a later date during the session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SALE OF GOODS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3450) to regulate the sales of goods in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRAZIER. Let that go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. FRAZIER. I withhold the objection.

Mr. KING. I have no interest in the bill, but the District Commissioners and the businessmen of the District of Columbia are very much in favor of it. It is in harmony with the sales bills in 42 States of the Union. The residents of Maryland and the residents of Virginia particularly are interested in the bill because they have commercial relations with the District; they have the Uniform Sales Act; we do not have it in the District of Columbia, and there is a great deal of confusion. It is a bill that the people desire to have enacted, and I sincerely hope it may be approved by the Senate.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to have time to look into the bill a little further. I ask that it go over.

Mr. KING. Let it be noted that the Senator from North Dakota objects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being heard, the bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH MAIER

The bill (H. R. 605) for the relief of Joseph Maier was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph Maier, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for judgment rendered in the Common Pleas Court of Franklin County, Ohio, against the Postal Telegraph Co., a corporation under Government control, for injuries received December 22, 1918, at Columbus, Ohio: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS WHO SERVED IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The bill (S. 3545) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I observe that the author of the bill, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], is present. Opportunity has not been afforded Senators to become familiar with the bill, and I ask that the Senator make an explanation of it.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill was thoroughly considered by the Committee on Claims, and the report was prepared by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky to make a statement as to the purpose of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, this bill was considered by the Senate Committee on Claims, and the statement of the bill is made in Report No. 1560.

The House of Representatives passed a similar bill without amendment. The Senate Committee on Claims reported Senate bill 3545 with an amendment. This morning the Committee on Claims, through its clerk, as the clerk had a right to do, reported the bill which passed the House with the same amendment which had been added to the Senate bill. I understand the House bill is on the desk at this time. So if that bill should be substituted for the Senate bill, it would be the same as the Senate bill, and would be different from the bill as it passed the House. I do not know whether or not the author of the bill is satisfied with the bill as reported by the Senate committee, but the House bill and the Senate bill as they appear on the desk at this time are alike, and both contain an amendment not satisfactory to many of those who desire to have the legislation enacted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to have an analysis of the bill, an explanation of what the bill would accomplish, the changes which it would make in the law.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have been trying for the last 2 or 3 years to analyze the bill and just what it would do, and I cannot do it. I can call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there were certain members of the military service in the Philippines during the Spanish-American War and soon thereafter who remained in the Philippines and later came home. Some of them, perhaps, were in jail, some of them were in hospitals, but for one reason or another they could not come home, as I understand, and they are entitled to travel pay. Other men, who voluntarily retired from the military service and remained in the Philippines, and perhaps are still there, are not entitled to the travel pay, it seemed to the Committee on Claims.

We placed an amendment on the Senate bill attempting to exclude all of those who voluntarily retired from the Army, and we attempted to restrict it to those who were unable, because of some particular reason, to take advantage at that time of the law which allowed them travel pay. We did not think it should apply to others than that particular unfortunate class. We tried to do that, and I think we have accomplished the purpose; but the House passed a bill in the same form in which it was passed by the last Congress, when it was vetoed by the President. A similar measure was passed through both Houses at the last session, and, as I recall, it was vetoed by the President.

These are the reasons why I do not know as much about the bill as perhaps I should. I myself have had to ask someone else about it. The amendment has been included at the request and on the suggestion of the War Department itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the total amount that would be required to meet the obligations under the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator that I do not think anyone knows. The amount would not be very great under the bill as amended. It was estimated that it would be a rather large sum under the bill as it passed at the last session, but I do not recall the amount.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the bill amended to conform with the veto message?

Mr. LOGAN. As I recall, the veto message simply relied on the statement of the War Department that the bill threw the doors open to many who were not entitled to the relief. When we took the matter up with the War Department, while they did not approve the proposed legislation, they did suggest that if the legislation should be passed a certain amendment ought to be added, and we added the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment eliminates relief to those who were not deemed to be deserving?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; it eliminates nearly all of them, and that is the reason why they are not satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas desire that House bill 9472 be substituted for the Senate bill?

Mr. CAPPER. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9472) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the numerals "1899", to add a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That no benefit shall accrue under any provision of this act to any person whose claim is based upon the service of any such officer or soldier discharged in the Philippine Islands at his own request", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain who were held to service in the Philippine Islands for service in the Philippine Insurrection after April 11, 1899, and after the conclusion of peace with the kingdom of Spain, shall be entitled to the travel pay and allowance for subsistence provided in sections 1289 and 1290, Revised Statutes, as then amended and in effect, as though discharged April 11, 1899, by reason of expiration of enlistment, and appointed or reenlisted April 12, 1899, without deduction of travel pay and subsistence paid such officers or soldiers on final muster out subsequent to April 11, 1899: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue under any provision of this act to any person whose claim is based upon the service of any such officer or soldier discharged in the Philippine Islands at his own request.

Sec. 2. Claims hereunder shall be settled in the General Accounting Office and shall be payable to the officer or soldier, or if the person who rendered the service is dead, then to his widow, children in equal shares (but not to their issue), father, or mother as provided by existing acts relating to the settlement of accounts of deceased officers and soldiers of the Army (34 Stat. 750); but if there is no widow, child, father, or mother at the date of settlement, then no payment on account of the claim shall be made.

Sec. 3. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to certify to the Congress, pursuant to the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 266), all claims allowed hereunder.

Sec. 4. Applications for the benefits of this act shall be filed within 3 years after the date of its passage.

Sec. 5. Payment to any attorney or agent for such assistance as may be required in the preparation and execution of the necessary papers in any application under this act shall not exceed the sum of $10: Provided, That this limitation shall not apply to attorneys employed by claimants entitled to the benefits of this act who were active in the prosecution of their claim before Congress, to whom a fee of not to exceed 10 percent of the amount found to be due may be allowed. Any person collecting or attempting to collect a greater amount than is herein allowed shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether, if the amendment to which he has just referred should be adopted, the bill would then meet with the approval of the War Department and meet the objections which were set forth in the President's veto message.

Mr. LOGAN. That is as I understand it. The War Department recommended against the bill, but, upon inquiry, we ascertained that if the bill should be passed, the War Department wanted it amended in the particular I have indicated, and we added the amendment which was suggested by the War Department. I do not think anyone can know very much about the bill, nearly 40 years after the time to which it relates, but we do know as a matter of fact that there were men entitled to the travel pay sought who never received it. There can be no question about that. They were left in the Philippines, and perhaps were unable to take advantage of the law at that time. Some of them were in hospitals, perhaps some of them were in confinement growing out of infractions of the military law, some of them were sick, and perhaps such men ought to be entitled to the travel pay. The man who got out of the Army and remained in the Philippines voluntarily, who for his own convenience did not come back, and was not deprived of his travel pay by reason of anything over which he did not have control, we do not think is entitled to the travel pay. We tried to limit application of the bill, and I think it is all right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is there any way by which to determine the meritorious from the unmeritorious cases? In other words, is there any machinery proposed to be set up for weeding out those not entitled to the travel pay and the compensation referred to?

Mr. LOGAN. I think so. My recollection is that they must file their applications with the General Accounting Office, and the General Accounting Office then will audit the claims and ascertain whether the claims are valid. This measure does not provide an appropriation to pay the beneficiaries so much money, but it authorizes them to file their claims with the General Accounting Office.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator be willing, if the bill shall be passed, to have it held on the table for a day or two until some of us can inquire of the War Department whether there are any objections or whether the amendment meets all of the objections of the President and of the War Department?

Mr. LOGAN. That would be a question for the Senator from Kansas to answer; but, personally, I should be very glad if someone else would look over the measure carefully, because I have been studying it for the past 2 or 3 years, and the more I look into it the more confused I become.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas be willing, if the bill shall be passed now, to hold it on the table subject to a motion to reconsider, so that we may have an opportunity to inquire of the War Department as to whether or not the bill as amended meets the objections raised in the President's veto and accords with the wishes of the War Department? If the Senator will agree to that, I shall have no objection at all to the bill being passed.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill is one of merit, and I want to see it passed; and I shall not offer any objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I will not offer any objection, then, with that understanding.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand the nature of the transaction between the two Senators.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in order to accomplish what I have suggested, I shall merely offer a motion to reconsider, and I can have the motion withdrawn when the information arrives.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the Senator was relying on a sort of a verbal understanding.

Mr. KING. No; I intended to offer a motion to reconsider. I did not want the Senator from Kansas to think I was opposing the measure. I merely want information from the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 3545 is indefinitely postponed.

Is it the desire of the Senator from Utah to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 9472 was passed?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL IN CRIMINAL CASES

The bill (S. 3781) limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a mere reading of the note on the calendar would not indicate the general purpose of the proposed legislation. I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this bill relates directly to a former Assistant Attorney General who recently resigned. It happened that when he resigned there had been assigned to him one case in the Supreme Court of the United States, and perhaps two or three smaller cases. He is now out of the public service. The bill would simply exempt him from the operation of the criminal statute in order that he might go on with his regular practice. The bill was sent to the Senate with the approval of the Department of Justice, and it has been thoroughly reviewed and investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States", approved March 4, 1909, as amended, or in section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in any other act of Congress forbidding officers or employees or former officers or employees of the United States from acting as counsel, attorney, or agent for another before any court, department, or branch of the Government, or from receiving or agreeing to receive compensation therefor, shall be deemed to apply to attorneys or counselors who have been or may be specially employed, retained, or appointed by the Attorney General or under authority of the Department of Justice to assist in the prosecution of the case pending in the Supreme Court of the United States entitled "The Sugar Institute, Inc., and others, appellants, against the United States of America" (docket no. 268, October term, 1935), or the investigation and prosecution of any case pending either in the Federal or State courts, in the western district of North Carolina, involving lands owned or claimed by the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, or by the United States in their behalf, or other public lands owned or involved in litigation in such western district of North Carolina.

GOVERNMENT FOR AMERICAN SAMOA

The bill (S. 3113) to provide a government for American Samoa was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is a very pretentious bill, which was not called to my attention until this morning, and I am anxious to read it so that I may see what it means.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. This is not a very extensive bill. The Senate has passed identical measures on three occasions. All it proposes to do is to give to the small population which makes up American Samoa the right of local self-government, namely, to try their own petty offenders.

All offenders now are tried before the naval Governor in American Samoa. Prior to the occupation of the island by the United States, the tribes, of which there are three main ones, used to try their own petty offenders. This bill will give the 12,000 persons who live in American Samoa the right to regulate their own tribal matters.

The bill comes before the Senate as the result of the investigation of the Commission which went out to the islands, of which the Democratic leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], was a member and other Senators and Representatives were members. This measure of local self-government has been promised to the people of American Samoa for a number of years. Similar bills have already passed the Senate three times. If this bill shall now pass the Senate, it will be the fourth time.

The bill has the unanimous backing of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. Every angle of the question that I know of has been examined. The bill was originally prepared while former Senator Bingham was chairman of the committee, and passed while he was still a Senator.

In view of that statement, I hope the Senator from New York will not make further objection.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there may be some who remember that I spoke for days against the alienation of sovereignty over the Philippines. In connection with my studies preparatory to that presentation here, I became very much interested in the method of acquisition of American Samoa. I have a number of doubts in my mind about it. I am exceedingly sorry to be disagreeable, but I desire to review the notes I made at the time before I am willing to have the bill considered.

I have no doubt the bill is meritorious. I have no doubt the bill is properly and comprehensively prepared, provided it be applied to our own territory. I should dislike to build a splendid house, a great palace, on land which did not belong to me. I do not know that I shall take that view when the time comes to consider the measure; but I say to the Senator that I must now object. I am sorry to have to do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the Senator is misinformed about the bill now pending before the Senate. This is a bill to provide a government for American Samoa. It is not a bill relating to the Philippines.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not talking about the Philippines. I am talking about Samoa. I thought this bill referred to Samoa. Does it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. To repeat what I said, in preparing myself for discussion of the Philippine procedure I had occasion to study the question of Samoa, which I understand is dealt with in this bill; and it is to Samoa that I am addressing my remarks on the subject.

I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no objection to the bill going over, but I am anxious that the Record shall carry the facts.

No question at all of sovereignty is involved in the bill. As the matter now stands, the inhabitants of American Samoa have no voice in the government which they make up. There are about 12,000 of them in the islands. Matters pertaining to discipline are in the hands of the naval Governor. All petty infractions are tried before the naval Governor. All the bill seeks to do is to give to the people who compose American Samoa the right to have control over their own intertribal matters.

Whether or not the bill becomes law is a matter of no concern to me, except that for 5 years, through representatives sent out there, we have promised to the people of the islands its enactment. I am a little sorry that the Senator from New York desires further to deny those people the right of local self-government. It will be the only place beneath the American flag where that right has been denied.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, one final word. I am not sure that these islands have a right to be under the American flag, and I wish to be sure that we are not building a government on islands to which we have no title. I may fully agree with the Senator from Maryland when I shall have reviewed the rather fragmentary recollections I have of the very serious study I made of the subject a long time ago. I think I never devoted myself more thoroughly to any subject in which I had a part in the Senate.

I am not asking that the 12,000 persons in American Samoa be deprived of government. I assume they have some kind of government or they would not stay there. But in due time, if the Senator will bear with me, I shall look into the matter, and it may well be that the next time the bill comes up I shall say, "All right; proceed with the matter so far as I am concerned."

For the moment, however, I desire further information. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. J. Res. 205) providing for disposition of certain cotton held by the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. On behalf of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3627) for the relief of Francis Gerrity was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Department opposes this measure. The Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] is not present, and by reason of that fact I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2243) relating to the allocation of radio facilities was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BRIDGE ACROSS POQUETANUCK COVE, CONN.

The bill (H. R. 10316) to legalize a bridge across Poquetanuck Cove at or near Ledyard, Conn., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SECOND CREEK, LAUDERDALE COUNTY, ALA.

The bill (H. R. 10465) to legalize a bridge across Second Creek, Lauderdale County, Ala., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, BETWEEN ROCKPORT, IND., AND OWENSBORO, KY.

The bill (H. R. 11045) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River between Rockport, Ind., and Owensboro, Ky., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF REPUBLICAN RIVER AND OTHER RIVERS

The bill (H. R. 8030) to authorize a preliminary examination of Republican River, Smoky Hill River, and minor tributaries of Kansas River, in the State of Kansas, with a view to the control of their floods was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have some information concerning this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me where the Republican River is?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. When I am at home I live on the banks of the Republican River.

Mr. KING. Change the name.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Senator name it?

Mr. NORRIS. The Republican River? No; it was named long before I went there.

Mr. President, this bill includes three rivers. Two of them are in Kansas. The Republican River is partially in Kansas, partially in Colorado, but chiefly in Nebraska. The bill, if enacted as it now stands, would prohibit any survey on the Republican River in any State besides Kansas, which would not be beneficial even to Kansas, because the mouth of the river is in Kansas. If we are to control the floods, of course we must provide for a survey in Nebraska and in Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection either to the Senator's amendment or to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have taken up this amendment with the various Senators interested, as well as with the author of the bill, Representative CARLSON, of Kansas, and they all agree to it and all see the necessity of it, even from the standpoint of Kansas.

On page 1, line 6, I move to strike out the words "in the State of Kansas."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize a preliminary examination of Republican River, Smoky Hill River, and minor tributaries of Kansas River, with a view to the control of their floods."

Mr. NORRIS. There is another bill on the calendar, Senate bill 4025, Calendar No. 1723, having the same purpose in view, and also favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce. I do not wish to have it indefinitely postponed, because I desire first to see whether the House will agree to the Senate amendment. Therefore I ask that Senate bill 4025, being Calendar No. 1723, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

COAST GUARD STATION, APOSTLE ISLANDS, WIS.

The bill (H. R. 8901) to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Apostle Islands, Wis., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION AND COMPLETION OF CERTAIN BRIDGES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3868) to amend section 32 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and/or completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States, and for other purposes", approved August 30, 1935, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, at the end of sections 1, 2, and 3, to strike out the words "its successors and assigns", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (a) of section 32 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and/or completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States, and for other purposes", approved August 30, 1935, is amended by striking out "the Village Board of the Village of Niobrara, county of Knox, State of Nebraska" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the county of Knox, State of Nebraska."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of such section 32 is amended by striking out "the Village Board of the Village of Niobrara, county of Knox, State of Nebraska" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the county of Knox, State of Nebraska."

SEC. 3. (a) Subsection (c) of such section 32 is amended by striking out "The said Village Board of the Village of Niobrara, county of Knox, State of Nebraska" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The said county of Knox, State of Nebraska."

(b) Subsection (c) of such section 32 is further amended by striking out "to fix the charge tolls for transit" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "to fix and charge tolls for transit."

SEC. 4. Subsection (d) of such section 32 is amended by striking out "After a sinking fund sufficient for amortization shall have been so provided, said bridge" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, said bridge."

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONONGAHELA, ALLEGHENY, AND YOUGHIOGHENY RIVER BRIDGES, PENNSYLVANIA

The bill (H. R. 10262) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of certain bridges across the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Youghiogheny Rivers in the county of Allegheny, Pa., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR DEPARTMENT EQUIPMENT FOR AMERICAN LEGION CONVENTION

The bill (S. 3997) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the Eighteenth National Convention of the American Legion at Cleveland, Ohio, during the month of September 1936, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to lend, at his discretion, to the American Legion 1936 Convention Corporation, for use at the Eighteenth National Convention of the American Legion to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, in the month of September 1936, such tents, cots, and blankets, and other available stock out of the Army and National Guard supplies as such corporation may require to house properly Legionnaires attending such convention: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of such property, the same to be delivered at such time prior to the holding of such convention as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the American Legion 1936 Convention Corporation: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering such property, shall take from such corporation a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of such property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

RESERVE OFFICERS' CORPS AND ENLISTED RESERVE CORPS

The bill (S. 4026) to amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas explain the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, under present law a Reserve officer or any person in the Enlisted Reserve Corps disabled by reason of wounds or disability received while on active duty for training purposes has no remedy. The War Department cannot give him continuing financial assistance, and the Veterans' Administration can give him no assistance; while, on the other hand, if a Reserve officer or any person in the Enlisted Reserve Corps is disabled while on active duty for any other purpose he is entitled under present law to relief. Thus the purpose of Senate bill 4026 is to strike from present law—Forty-eighth Statutes, page 161—the words "except for training", so as to make eligible for veterans' relief those Reserve members disabled while on active duty for training purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many officers come within the purview of the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. All Reserve officers who take the 14-day training period each year. The War Department estimates the cost of this legislation will not exceed $2,210 for the first complete year of its operation. Each succeeding year the cost will be increased by less than this amount owing to deaths on the pension list until the total removals from the list equal the total number placed on the list under this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 112 of the National Defense Act, as amended by the act of June 15, 1933 (48 Stat. 161), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the phrase "except for training."

PURPLE HEART DECORATION TO MAJ. CHARLES H. SPRAGUE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3821) granting the Purple Heart decoration to Maj. Charles H. Sprague, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause the recommendation for the award of the Purple Heart Medal to Maj. Charles H. Sprague, formerly captain, Medical Reserves, One Hundred and Third Ambulance Company, Twenty-sixth Division, to be considered by the proper boards or authorities and such award to be made to Major Sprague if it is found by such boards or authorities that he was wounded in combat with an enemy of the United States during the World War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the award of the Purple Heart decoration to Maj. Charles H. Sprague."

FELIX GRIEGO

The bill (S. 3537) for the relief of Felix Griego was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have read the report and I notice that the bill is strongly objected to by the War Department. In view of the fact that a number of measures which the Senate has recently passed restoring discharged soldiers to the pensionable list have been vetoed by the President, it occurs to me that, for the present, at least, this measure, as well as the two or three succeeding, should be further considered. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Utah that this bill was recommended at the last session, but, due to the near approach of final adjournment, it did not have an opportunity of coming before the committee. It is in the view of the committee a very meritorious case.

The expulsion of the beneficiary of the bill from the Army was due to a conviction which was later set aside by the supreme court, and later, as I recall, he was found not guilty of the charges for which he was discharged from the Army. It is a most meritorious case, and, I trust, the Senator will not object. He will find the facts set forth in the report.

Mr. KING. I note from the report that the War Department says the soldier was drunk and brought the Army into disrepute and discredit, and he was discharged from the Army.

Mr. BACHMAN. I presume there are thousands of soldiers who have done that.

Mr. KING. I hope not.

Mr. BACHMAN. But, I repeat, this really is a meritorious case, because the man was not guilty of the offense for which he was discharged, and it was so found by the supreme court.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator take the view that the War Department, in holding that he was drunk and had brought discredit upon the Army, acted improperly?

Mr. BACHMAN. No, sir; not at all. But that was not the basis of his expulsion from the service.

Mr. KING. That is what is shown by the report.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am more or less familiar with this particular bill, having been its author and having given a good deal of consideration to it at the present and at the last session.

What the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] has said is exactly correct. The man was not discharged from the Army on account of drunkenness at all; that was not involved in the notation that was made on his Army record; but he was convicted of an offense, and because of that conviction he was discharged. Then he appealed to the supreme court of the State, and the conviction was set aside. The case was later returned to the lower court, but he was never tried again, and after it was returned to the lower court the whole case was dismissed.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it was after that that this bill was introduced for his relief?

Mr. HATCH. It was subsequent to that, and was introduced because his conviction had been set aside.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me the claimant should have the relief.

Mr. BACHMAN. If I may interrupt further, I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that the basis of his discharge from the Army was his conviction of an offense which the supreme court subsequently set aside.

Mr. KING. Very well, I withdraw my objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3537) for the relief of Felix Griego was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers or their dependents Felix Griego, who was a private in the Medical Department, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of the Medical Department on the 11th day of April 1919: Provided, That no back pay, compensation, benefit, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

DANIEL YATES

The bill (S. 3128) for the relief of Daniel Yates was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the War Department in its report on this bill uses the word "strongly"—it strongly objects to this bill. Let it go over.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. What the Senator says about the statement of the War Department is true. The War Department, however, makes mistakes; otherwise we would not have these bills here occasionally. Here are the undisputed facts relating to this particular man:

He was charged with desertion in 1889, perhaps, at any rate, a long time ago. He wandered away; of course, he was finally declared to be a deserter and his name was entered on the record as such; but there are three witnesses who testify that they saw this man, one of them the next day, after he left his command; that he was then insane; two others saw him the following day, 2 days after his alleged desertion; they said he was insane, and was just wandering around the country. He has been insane ever since. It seems to me in a case where a man left his command while insane, and has been insane, according to the evidence, ever since, that relief should be accorded.

The War Department did not know that; he was discharged from the Army without it being known. The poor fellow has been denied hospitalization; he has been denied any benefits because he went crazy and wandered away; but he was fortunate enough, or some of his friends were, to prove that he was seen by three witnesses within 2 days after he left and that he was insane. Those are the facts in the case.

Mr. KING. The letter from the War Department is of quite recent date, as I recall, long subsequent to the date of the alleged mental defect.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. And the Department would have learned of it in the meantime.

Mr. LOGAN. They could not learn of it. How could they know, as they never saw the man again? He went away; he was never brought back; and they could know nothing from the records about his mental condition. They just could not do it; it was not their function to find out about it. The War Department in every case has a stock phrase or stereotype phrase to the effect that the passage of this bill or that bill would be discrimination, and all that. I do not want to criticize the War Department; it is a rather good thing to have, but, at the same time, we would get much more help if they gave us the facts and made some recommendations to the committee rather than relying on stereotype phrases in practically all cases like this; they are just against it because it does not fit in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows and dependent relatives, Daniel Yates, formerly private, Battery D, First Regiment Artillery, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private on June 24, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 3340) for the relief of Jesse S. Post was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that bill. As the Senator who reported it does not appear to be present, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MICHAEL P. LUCAS

The bill (H. R. 2469) for the relief of Michael P. Lucas was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFINITION OF "FLYING OFFICER" IN THE AIR CORPS

The bill (S. 3974) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes", approved July 2, 1926, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this seems to be an important bill, and I should like to have the Senator from Texas explain it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to clarify the present definition of a "flying officer" in the Army Air Corps. The bill is recommended by the War Department. It is proposed to strike out the words which define a flying officer in the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 781), and substitute therefor a new and more consistent definition which meets present developments and organization in the Air Service. By a ruling of the Comptroller General, the conception of a "flying officer" as used in the 1926 act has been restricted to a "pilot" alone. The development of the modern airplane has produced other functions of great importance which sound military judgment says must be performed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would that mean anyone who goes up in an airplane would be designated as a "flying officer"?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No, indeed.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator remembers there was quite a controversy for some years as to whether doctors attached to the Air Corps—of course, I do not see how doctors could very well practice their profession in airplanes—should be entitled to greater pay. I am just wondering if this bill includes doctors, and what effect its passage will have, and how much it will cost.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me proceed with the explanation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There are aerial commanders and aerial navigators, and while they function as such may or may not perform piloting duties simultaneously. Under these circumstances it is inconceivable that only the pilot shall be considered as the flying officer, while the commander, navigator, bomber, gunner, and communications officer, whose duties are equally essential to the accomplishment of the military mission and whose duties are performed in the air under the same hazards are considered nonflying officers.

Furthermore, present law provides that only 10 percent of the officers of the Air Corps in each grade below brigadier general may be nonflying officers, then obviously in time the 10 percent nonflying officers allowed in each grade will be exceeded. Senate bill 3974 is designed to correct these deficiencies of the present law, and it permits the efficient development of Air Corps personnel for peace or war.

If the bill is enacted, it will not increase the applicable appropriation proposed in the 1937 appropriation bill. If it is not enacted, it will reduce the proposed appropriation by approximately $23,000. This amount represents the difference in the pay of approximately 65 officers paid at the increased rate of $1,440 per annum for flying duty, instead of 50 percent of their base pay for flying duty. This is a very small increase and gives them the rank for which their duties call.

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Senator's explanation it seems to be a worthy measure, but I ask that it may go over to let me look into it further.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 3699) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a center of music, and its contribution to the art of music for the past 50 years, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

MUNICIPAL DEBT READJUSTMENT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6982) to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary without amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is a clerical error in the bill, which should be corrected. On page 4, line 8, the number of the paragraph should be changed. I move to strike out "(b)" and insert "(d)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment just made, but I should like an explanation of the measure.

Mr. NEELY. I did not report the bill and am not prepared to explain it. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] reported it.

Mr. KING. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar 1672, being House bill 6982. During my temporary absence from the Chamber this bill was reached, and I am informed that it went over at the request of my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Another bill in substantially the same form, introduced by myself, passed the Senate at the last session. The House for some reason acted upon a House bill and adopted an amendment which was not in the Senate bill, the amendment having relation to the percentage that must be obtained in order to avail of the proceeds.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, am I to understand that this means only that portion of the municipality bankruptcy law which refers to drainage districts?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 6982) to amend section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subparagraphs (a) and (d) of section 80 of chapter 9 of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 80. Municipal debt readjustments: (a) Any municipality or other political subdivision of any State, including (but not hereby limiting the generality of the foregoing) any county, city, borough, village, parish, town, or township, unincorporated tax or special assessment district, and any school, drainage, irrigation, reclamation, levee, sewer, or paving, sanitary, port, improvement, or other districts (hereinafter referred to as a 'taxing district'), may file a petition stating that the taxing district is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a plan of readjustment of its debts. The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the taxing district or the major part thereof is located and for any such district having no officials of its own the petition shall be filed by the municipality or political subdivision, the officials of which have power to contract on behalf of said district or to levy the special assessments within such district. The petition shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other chapters of this act. The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed and submitted with the petition, and that creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 30 percent in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts (except as hereinafter provided) and owning not less than 51 percent in the case of all other taxing districts in amount of the bonds, notes, and certificates of indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have accepted it in writing. The petition shall be accompanied with such written acceptance and with a list of all known creditors of the taxing district, together with their addresses so far as known to the taxing district, and description of their respective claims showing separately those who have accepted the plan of readjustment, together with their separate addresses, the contents of which list shall not constitute admissions by the taxing districts in a proceeding under this chapter or otherwise. Upon the filing of such a petition the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this chapter, if satisfied that such petition complies with this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it, if not so satisfied. If creditors holding 5 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness shall, within 90 days after the first publication of the notice provided for in subdivision (c), clause (1), of this chapter, appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition, the judge shall decide the issues presented, and unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained, shall dismiss the petition: Provided, however, That such written acceptance of not less than 30 percent of the creditors of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts shall not be required in any case where a loan shall have been authorized to the petitioning taxing district by an agency of the United States Government for the purpose of enabling any such petitioning district to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness.

"(d) The plan of readjustment shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, filed in the proceeding, by or on behalf of creditors holding at least 51 percent in amount of the claims of each class in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding two-thirds in amount of the claims of each class in the case of all other taxing districts whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan, and by creditors holding 51 percent in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding 75 percent in the case of all other taxing districts in amount of the claims of all classes of the taxing district affected by the plan, but excluding claims owned, held, or controlled by a taxing district, and such plan has been accepted and approved by the taxing district in a writing filed in the proceeding, signed in its name by an authorized authority: Provided, however, That it shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan that there be such acceptance by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditors or class of creditors."

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3452) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States or Territories for the education, medical attention, relief of distress, and social welfare of Indians, and for other purposes", was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill? If not, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3301) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the heirs of James Taylor, deceased Cherokee Indian, for the value of certain lands now held by the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I note that similar bills have twice been vetoed by the President. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PUBLIC SCHOOL BUILDINGS AT HAYS, MONT.

The bill (S. 3372) to provide funds for cooperation with the public school district at Hays, Mont., for construction and improvement of public school buildings to be available for Indian children, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the Hays Public School District, Hays, Mont., for construction and improvement of grade- and high-school buildings: Provided, That said schools shall be available to both white and Indian children without discrimination, except that tuition may be paid for Indian children attending in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That expenditures of moneys authorized hereby shall be subject to such further conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be reimbursed in not more than 30 years without interest, either through reducing the annual Federal tuition payments for the education of Indian pupils attending such school, by the acceptance of Indian pupils in such school without cost to the United States; or in such other manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: And provided further, That plans and specifications shall be furnished by local or State authorities, without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, work shall proceed under the direction of local or State officials, payment therefor to be made monthly on the basis of work in place and upon vouchers approved by a responsible official of the Indian Service.

JOHN WALKER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3371) for the relief of John Walker, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "Montana", to insert the words "or his heirs", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Walker, of Hays, Mont., or his heirs, the sum of $200 in full settlement of his claim against the United States for destruction of a one-room log house and equipment located on the Fort Belknap Reservation in Montana, during a diphtheria epidemic on said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3053) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Assiniboine Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GUSTAVA HANNA

The bill (S. 4091) for the relief of Gustava Hanna was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask that House bill 11425, an identical bill, which appears on the Senate calendar as Order of Business No. 1698, be substituted for the Senate bill and considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 11425) for the relief of Gustava Hanna was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Gustava Hanna, widow of Matthew E. Hanna, late American minister to Guatemala, the sum of $10,000, equal to 1 year's salary of her deceased husband.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 4091 will be indefinitely postponed.

CLARENCE R. KILLION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3912) to amend an act for the relief of Clarence R. Killion, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "numbered", to strike out the numerals "226" and insert the numerals "222"; on the same page, line 12, after the word "war", to strike out the words "veterans' act" and insert the words "adjusted compensation act", and on page 2, line 2, after the word "act" to insert the words "as amended", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Private Law No. 222, Seventy-second Congress, entitled "An act for the relief of Clarence R. Killion", be amended by eliding the period after the word "act" in the last line of the said act, substituting a colon therefor, and adding thereto the following: "And provided further, That if the veteran shall, within 12 months from the date of final passage and approval of this act, as amended, file with the Veterans' Administration an application for adjusted-service benefits under the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, then, and in that event, nothing in this act, as amended, contained shall be construed to prejudice his right to recover adjusted-service benefits thereunder if found otherwise entitled thereto."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, GARRISON, N. DAK.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3885) to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak., which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "by", to strike out the words "the acts of Congress approved February 10, 1932, and February 14, 1933, and June 12, 1934, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 12, 1934", and to insert in lieu thereof the words "an act of Congress approved February 10, 1932, heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved February 14, 1933, June 12, 1934, and May 24, 1935, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 12, 1936", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Garrison, N. Dak., authorized to be built by the State of North Dakota, by an act of Congress approved February 10, 1932, heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved February 14, 1933, June 12, 1934, and May 24, 1935, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 12, 1936.

Sec. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAKE SABINE BRIDGE, PORT ARTHUR, TEX.

The bill (H. R. 10185) to amend the act approved June 18, 1934, authorizing the city of Port Arthur, Tex., or the commission thereby created and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over Lake Sabine, at or near Port Arthur, Tex., and to extend the times for commencing and completing the said bridge, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2041) for the relief of Charles E. Wilson was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

The bill (S. 3659) to promote the efficiency of the Judge Advocate General's department of the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the bill go over.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator making the objection withhold his objection for a brief explanation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill does not increase the cost of operating the Judge Advocate General's department to a greater extent than about $20 a month, I believe. It authorizes an assistant to the Judge Advocate General with the title of brigadier general.

The situation at the present time is that when the Judge Advocate General is absent or not able to attend to his duties usually the next senior officer present has charge of the office. This does not necessarily mean that he is the most capable officer present. The bill would only change the situation to the extent that the President himself may name an assistant, subject to the approval of the Senate, I assume, and then in the office of the Judge Advocate General there would always be someone to take the place of the Judge Advocate General when he happened to be absent or incapacitated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My memorandum indicates that the War Department is in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Secretary of War is in opposition to the bill. I believe, however, that anyone who looks into the situation for the purpose of satisfying himself and will talk to anyone he can get to talk to him in connection with the Judge Advocate General's department—which will not be very many because they are perhaps afraid to talk—will learn that this proposed legislation is really necessary and for the good of the service.

The only objection the War Department has to it is that some other department or division that does not now have one would also want an assistant. As a matter of fact, there is no just ground for such objection.

That is the explanation I desire to make. I am very hopeful that the bill may be passed. However, if any Senator wishes to look into it later, there will be plenty of time to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It would seem to me, in view of the long experience of the department, especially during the World War, that if an Assistant Judge Advocate General were required, one would have been recommended by the War Department in the past.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that it has been asked for. The matter has been discussed for a good while.

The passage of the bill will not add anything to the cost. It will not disorganize anything at all. The only thing it will do is to have some man named by the President to look after these duties who will have equal rank with the heads of other divisions with whom he will come in contact. The bill provides for nothing else. Instead of having a haphazard method of allowing someone to represent the Judge Advocate General, the bill simply says that a man designated by the President shall do so at all times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PROCUREMENT OF WAR DEPARTMENT PROPERTY WITHOUT ADVERTISING

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3859) to authorize the procurement, without advertising, of certain War Department property, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever proposals are invited for the furnishing of articles of Chemical Warfare or Signal property of the War Department, the character of which or the ingredients thereof are of such a nature that the interests of the public service would be injured by publicly divulging them, the chief of the supply service concerned is authorized to purchase such articles in such manner as he may deem most economical and efficient.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas, who introduced the bill, explain it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, from time to time the Chemical Warfare Service and the Signal Corps have developed equipment the details of which, in the opinion of the respective chiefs of these branches, should not be divulged to any but firms known to be capable of supplying the requirements.

In purchasing articles of this character, however, it is necessary to divulge plans and specifications embodying these details to all bidders, in order to comply with the existing statutes. This bill is recommended for enactment by the War Department in order to meet the situation as to certain devices the nature of which should not be given out; and it provides that as to these articles, the departments shall purchase them in the manner it deems most advisable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are the articles which may be purchased set out in the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill is limited to articles which the War Department believes, for reasons of state, should not be publicly divulged—for this reason they are not specifically mentioned.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would cover virtually the whole field of purchases by the War Department.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Only as to these particular articles. We have to trust the Department to this extent.

Mr. McKELLAR. What articles are they? As I understand the language of the measure, it would allow the Department to say what articles they were. They might be gunpowder, cannon for the Army, guns, rifles, or anything of the kind.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill applies only to the Chemical Warfare Service and the Signal Corps.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, does not the Signal Corps make purchases of wire and many other standard commodities?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If so, the bill would not apply to them. There has to be some special reason for not divulging the character of the commodity in order to have the provisions of the bill apply.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2158) for the relief of Franz J. Feinler was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM T. J. RYAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3692) for the relief of William T. J. Ryan, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after "1916" and the first parenthesis, to insert "39"; and in line 7, after the word "then", to strike out "staff", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 649), relating to Federal support of families of enlisted men in the Military Establishment who served during the expedition into Mexico, the claim of William T. J. Ryan, then sergeant, Headquarters Battery, Seventy-sixth Regiment United States Field Artillery, Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., for Federal support of his wife, Beulah E. Ryan, be held and considered to have been received in the office of the depot quartermaster, Washington, D. C., on or before June 30, 1917, in view of the fact that delay in receipt occurred through no fault of the soldier but through loss or miscarriage of his application in the mails.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the next bill on the calendar, Senate bill 3726, is adversely reported by the War Department. It proposes to give the rank of lieutenant general to the Deputy Chief of Staff.

In view of the report of the Secretary of War, I cannot understand the justification for the proposed legislation. In the report is contained a letter from the Secretary of War, in which the following statement appears:

The office of Deputy Chief of Staff is an important position and is habitually filled by an officer whose rank is that of major general. Such officer is the principal assistant of the Chief of Staff and though his position is one of great responsibility, both in peace and war, an increase in rank for those occupying such position, in times of peace, would immediately raise the question of corresponding increased rank for other staff assistants such as the chiefs of the various divisions of the General Staff, the chiefs of branches, and their assistants.

Further, omitting a part of the letter:

Congress in its last session passed a bill providing accelerated promotions for the commissioned personnel of practically the entire Army and it is the view of the War Department that no effort should be made toward the enactment of legislation providing additional increased promotions among the commissioned personnel, particularly of the higher ranks, in the absence of a pressing need therefor.

The War Department does not favor the enactment of S. 3726 at this time.

No cost to the Government would result from the enactment of S. 3726.

This proposed legislation was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget which reports that it is not in accord with the financial program of the President.

I ask that the bill go over.

MR. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before the bill goes over I desire to present briefly the views of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in order that both sides of the problem may be before the Senate.

The office of Deputy Chief of Staff already exists, and is filled by an officer temporarily detailed to it, whose rank is customarily that of major general. The Deputy Chief of Staff is the principal assistant to the Chief of Staff, who is a full general while acting as Chief of Staff; and the purpose of this bill is to confer the temporary rank and title of lieutenant general upon the officer detailed or assigned as Deputy Chief of Staff in order that he may rank next to his chief, and may have title and rank commensurate with his responsibilities. Furthermore, the Deputy Chief of Staff, when acting as Chief of Staff, actually gives orders to corps area commanders who now hold the same rank as that of the Deputy Chief of Staff, namely, that of major general. This is another reason for giving the Deputy Chief of Staff a higher rank than that of major general.

The enactment of this legislation will occasion the Government no additional cost, inasmuch as the officer assigned as Deputy Chief of Staff will continue to receive the pay and allowances of a major general.

The War Department does not favor this bill, feeling that it will raise the question of corresponding increased rank for other staff assistants, such as the chiefs of the various divisions of the General Staff and the chiefs of branches. However, the Military Affairs Committee feels that this increased rank and title for the Deputy Chief of Staff is justified in view of the responsibilities of the office, and in view of the further fact that the bill will occasion no additional expense.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

SALE OF TIMBER ON INDIAN LAND

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 215) to amend Public Act No. 435, Seventy-second Congress, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the words "day of", to strike out "March" and insert "September", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the last proviso in that Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the terms of existing contracts for the sale of timber on Indian land when it is in the interest of the Indians so to do", as amended, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows: "And provided further, That the authority granted herein shall terminate on the 4th day of September 1936: Provided further, That all such modified contracts shall have the approval of the tribal general council for tribal lands and of the allottee for allotted lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE CLAIM 111, PARCEL 1, NAMBE PUEBLO GRANT

The bill (S. 3460) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the persons entitled to compensation on account of Private Claim 111, Parcel 1, Nambé Pueblo grant, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to find and determine the person or persons entitled to participate in the award of the Pueblo Lands Board in Private Claim 111, Parcel 1, Nambé Pueblo grant. The finding of the Secretary of the Interior shall be final and conclusive, and the person or persons so found entitled shall be compensated out of the appropriations authorized by section 3 of the act of May 31, 1933 (48 Stat. L., 108-109).

MAIZEE HAMLEY

The bill (S. 3747) for the relief of Maizee Hamley was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit to Maizee Hamley, staff nurse in the Kiowa Agency, Anadarko, Okla., for the amount of $946.70 received as dual compensation for the period July 1, 1928, to September 30, 1932, while employed as nurse and postmistress at the Havasupai Agency, Supai, Ariz., in contravention of the act of May 10, 1916, as amended (39 Stat. 120, 582), which prohibits payment of more than one salary, when the combined amounts of such salaries exceed the rate of $2,000 per annum.

MRS. EARL H. SMITH

The bill (H. R. 7788) for the relief of Mrs. Earl H. Smith was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARD FUNERAL HOME

The bill (H. R. 8032) for the relief of the Ward Funeral Home was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8588) to authorize the deposit and investment of Indian funds was announced as next in order.

MR. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill? [A pause.] If not, I think the bill had better go over.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SECOND BYRD ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 209) authorizing the presentation of silver medals to the personnel of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, directed to cause to be made at the United States Mint such number of silver medals as he may deem appropriate and necessary, respectively, to be presented to the deserving personnel of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition that spent the winter night at Little America or who commanded either one of the expedition ships throughout the expedition, to express the high admiration in which the Congress and the American people hold their heroic and undaunted accomplishments for science, unequalled in the history of polar exploration.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, ARIZONA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 813) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to establish a fish-cultural station in Arizona, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "station", to strike out "at the head of Williams Creek within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation"; in line 6, after the word "Arizona", to insert "and such station shall be operated and maintained"; and in line 10, after "1930", to insert "Provided, That in the event of the establishment of a fish-cultural station within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and in consideration of the consent of the Indians of said reservation to the location of the same thereon without cost to the United States the streams therein shall be kept well stocked with mountain trout; that Indians shall be given preference in all labor opportunities at the prevailing rate of wages; and that in the purchase of otherwise worthless ponies required by said station, Indians shall be given preference in supplying same at commercial rates: Provided further, That sufficient pasturage for such ponies on said reservation will be made available to such fish-cultural station without compensation therefor to said Indians, except as provided for herein", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Arizona and such station shall be operated and maintained in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for a 5-year construction and maintenance program for the United States Bureau of Fisheries", approved May 21, 1930: Provided, That in the event of the establishment of a fish-cultural station within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and in consideration of the consent of the Indians of said reservation to the location of the same thereon without cost to the United States the streams therein shall be kept well stocked with mountain trout; that Indians shall be given preference in all labor opportunities at the prevailing rate of wages; and that in the purchase of otherwise worthless ponies required by said station, Indians shall be given preference in supplying same at commercial rates: Provided further, That sufficient pasturage for such ponies on said reservation will be made available to such fish-cultural station without compensation therefor to said Indians, except as provided for herein.

SEC. 2. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill, in line 13, page 2, by inserting, after the word "hereby", the words "authorized to be."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 13, after the word "hereby", it is proposed to insert "authorized to be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIXTEENTH TRIENNIAL CONVENTION, WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3950) to aid in defraying the expenses of the Fourteenth Triennial Convention of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union to be held in this country in June 1937, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "of the", to strike out "Fourteenth" and insert "Sixteenth"; and in line 6, after the word "World's", to strike out "Women's" and insert "Woman's", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to aid in defraying the expenses of the Sixteenth Triennial Convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union to be held in this country in June 1937, such sum to be expended for such purposes and under such regulations as the Secretary of State shall prescribe and without regard to any other provision of law.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to aid in defraying the expenses of the Sixteenth Triennial Convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union to be held in this country in June 1937."

LOUIS H. CORDIS

The bill (S. 1075) for the relief of Louis H. Cordis was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the requirements of sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in the case of Louis H. Cordis, of Portland, Oreg., formerly employed as a deck-hand on the United States dredge Clatsop, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is authorized and directed to consider and act upon any claim filed by him under the provisions of such act, as amended, within 1 year after the date of enactment of this act, for compensation for disability resulting from injuries received by him on September 15, 1928, while cleaning, in the performance of his duties as such employee, certain sand chutes: Provided, That compensation, if any, shall be paid from and after the date of enactment of this act. Such payments of compensation shall be made out of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the payment of awards under the provisions of such act of September 7, 1916, as amended.

HERMAN SCHIERHOFF

The bill (H. R. 977) for the relief of Herman Schierhoff was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH HALSTEAD

The bill (H. R. 4638) for the relief of Elizabeth Halstead was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which House bill 4638 was passed may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the bill was passed is reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SAM CABLE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6335) for the relief of Sam Cable, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sam Cable, of Falmouth, Mich., the sum of $300, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages to him caused by the slaying of 15 head of cattle known as abortion reactors in connection with the Government's efforts to eradicate this disease from the dairy herds of Missaukee County, Mich.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of any Senator interested in this bill whether the appropriation made heretofore for the elimination of Bang's disease would not care for cases of this kind?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I confess that I cannot answer that question, because this case does not seem to be covered by the general law. Otherwise the Committee on Claims and others would not be interested. The bill carries only a small amount, and the claim does not come under any general law.

Mr. KING. It may be that other claims may be presented, and I want to know whether the large sum we appropriated a few days ago, and the large sum appropriated a year ago, would not be available for meeting charges of this kind.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not my understanding, because this was passed upon before the general law was enacted.

Mr. KING. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD C. PAXTON

The bill (H. R. 8038) for the relief of Edward C. Paxton was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF EMIL HOYER

The bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of the estate of Emil Hoyer (deceased) was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill? If not, let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE RABCINSKI

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3685) for the relief of George Rabcinski, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to add at the end of the bill a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George Rabcinski, former private, Company E, Three Hundred and Fifty-ninth Regiment, Infantry, the sum of $140.37, being the par value of one second Liberty Loan bond together with interest which had accrued prior to its call, and for which he has paid the United States by deduction from his pay as an enlisted man, and which bond was erroneously delivered to persons unknown and not designated by him to receive it: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RALPH RIESLER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2126) for the relief of Ralph Riesler, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, to strike out the word "Riesler" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "Reisler"; on line 6, to strike out "$5,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,000 in full settlement of all claims against the United States"; and at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Ralph Reisler the sum of $2,000 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages suffered by reason of his son, Ralph Reisler, being struck and killed by a Government automobile which was driven by an employee of the Post Office Department: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Ralph Reisler."

CATHARINE I. KLEIN

The bill (S. 4019) for the relief of Catharine I. Klein was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of this bill. If there is no one here to explain it, let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RODMAN CHEMICAL CO.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 223) conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction of the claim of the Rodman Chemical Co. against the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may we have an explanation regarding this measure? I notice that the War Department is opposed to its enactment.

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LYDIA C. SPRY

The bill (H. R. 381) granting insurance to Lydia C. Spry was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN T. CLARK

The bill (H. R. 4439) for the relief of John T. Clark, of Seattle, Wash., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND VIEW HOSPITAL AND DR. A. J. O'BRIEN

The bill (H. R. 5764) to compensate the Grand View Hospital and Dr. A. J. O'Brien, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE S. GEER

The bill (S. 1419) for the relief of George S. Geer, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George S. Geer, formerly a corporal, Company M, Forty-sixth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, 2 months' extra pay in full satisfaction of his claim for benefits under the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting extra pay to officers and enlisted men of the United States Volunteers", approved January 12, 1899, as amended, such claim having been disallowed because said George S. Geer was discharged prior to the date of the general order authorizing the muster out of volunteers serving in the Philippine Islands.

PETRA M. BENAVIDES

The bill (H. R. 1363) for the relief of Petra M. Benavides was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill? If not, let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DAVID DUQUAINE, JR.

The bill (H. R. 8061) for the relief of David Duquaine, Jr., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MR. AND MRS. BRUCE LEE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3952) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Lee, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the words "not otherwise appropriated" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Lee, father and mother of Murvel Lee, the sum of $2,500, out of any money in the Treasury allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of said Murvel Lee, who was killed when struck by an automobile owned by the Department of Agriculture, and driven by an enrollee of the Civilian Conservation Corps, near Clearfield, Rowan County, Ky., on January 14, 1934: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SARAH SHELTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2982) for the relief of Sarah Shelton, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$6,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$5,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Sarah Shelton, of Granite City, Ill., the sum of $5,000 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the death of her husband, William Shelton, who was killed by being run down by a launch under the control and charge of the deputy collector of customs at St. Louis, Mo., while said deputy collector was in the exercise and discharge of his official duties: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BARBARA BACKSTROM

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4387) for the relief of Barbara Backstrom, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan to hear, determine, and render judgment, as if the United States were suable in tort, upon the claim of Barbara Backstrom, of Muskegon, Mich., for damages resulting from injuries sustained in falling from an unguarded spot on the lighthouse maintained by the Government at the entrance of the channel leading from Lake Michigan into the Muskegon Lake Harbor on July 7, 1934: Provided, That the judgment, if any, shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

SEC. 2. Suit upon such claim may be instituted at any time within 1 year after the enactment of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings for the determination of such claims, and appeals from and payment of any judgment thereon, shall be in the same manner as in the cases of claims over which such court has jurisdiction, under the provisions of paragraph twentieth, of section 24, of the Judicial Code, as amended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I thought a rule had been established that cases similar to this were to be referred to the Court of Claims. I have no objection to sending these tort actions to the Court of Claims for ascertainment of the facts, but we had better consider very thoroughly the proposal to send them all to the Federal courts throughout the United States.

Mr. COUZENS. May I point out to the Senator that this is a case where, in my judgment, the Committee on Claims should have allowed this claim, but I was unable to convince the committee they should allow it. So, as a substitute, they proposed the amendment just stated.

This particular case arose in Muskegon, Mich., and if the claimant had to come to Washington to prosecute the case before the Court of Claims there would be nothing left for her because of the limit of $5,000 which she could receive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just about to ask the Senator whether the claimant lived near the court where the claim is to be tried.

Mr. COUZENS. Within a few miles.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is correct in his position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Barbara Backstrom."

ODESSA MASON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1252) for the relief of Odessa Mason, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out the words "not otherwise appropriated" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, to Odessa Mason, of the city of Newport, Tenn., the sum of $750 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for bodily injuries sustained by her on September 13, 1933, when an automobile in which she was riding was in collision with a truck of the Civilian Conservation Corps, on State Highway No. 75: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SALE OF LAND TO HOT SPRINGS, N. MEX.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7024) to authorize the sale by the United States to the municipality of Hot Springs, N. Mex., the northeast half of the southeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 6, township 14 south, range 4 west, Hot Springs, N. Mex., which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the word "northeast" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "north"; and, on page 2, line 4, after the numerals "1933", to insert a comma and the words "pursuant to the provisions of section 17 of the act of November 29, 1929 (42 Stat. 212)", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to patent to the city of Hot Springs, N. Mex., upon payment by such city of a purchase price at the rate of $1.25 per acre, the land on the north half of the southeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 6, township 14 south, range 4 west, New Mexico principal meridian, New Mexico, for the purpose of enabling such city to establish a permanent recreational site and municipal golf course, subject to the highway right-of-way shown on a map approved by the Department of Interior on December 13, 1933, pursuant to the provisions of section 17 of the act of November 9, 1929 (42 Stat. 212). Such conveyance shall contain the express condition that if such city shall at any time cease to use such property for such purposes, or shall alienate or attempt to alienate such property, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to authorize the sale by the United States to the municipality of Hot Springs, N. Mex., of the north half of the southeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 6, township 14 south, range 4 west, New Mexico principal meridian, New Mexico."

DISPOSAL OF MATERIAL TO BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

The bill (S. 3990) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of material to the sea-scout service of the Boy Scouts of America was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill is identical with Order of Business 1766, House bill 9671, and I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill and be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9671) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of material to the sea-scout service of the Boy Scouts of America.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the property that is to be so disposed of?

Mr. COPELAND. It is boats and other material from the Coast Guard, unneeded materials, to be given to the Boy Scouts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 3990 will be indefinitely postponed.

EXAMINATION OF MARSHY HOPE CREEK

The bill (H. R. 10975) authorizing a preliminary examination of Marshy Hope Creek, a tributary of the Nanticoke River, at and within a few miles of Federalsburg, Caroline County, Md., with a view to the controlling of floods was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE REPUBLICAN RIVER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4025) to authorize a preliminary examination of the Republican River with a view to the control of its floods, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Republican River and its tributaries, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think this bill was indefinitely postponed. It certainly has been acted on.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the bill just read is a bill to authorize an examination of the Republican River with a view to controlling its floods. There is no objection to this bill, but let me suggest that the ever-rising tide of Republican floods cannot be controlled by any legislative act.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this bill went over at the request of the Senator from Nebraska. It was to be retained on the calendar to see what action the House would take on the amendment to the House bill adopted earlier in the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. The name of the river ought to be changed. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a House bill similar to the Senate bill was passed, and I thought the Senate bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. The House bill was amended and passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] did not want the Senate bill indefinitely postponed. He wanted it to remain on the calendar, so that if the House did not act in harmony with his views the bill would be on the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. He wanted it to remain on the calendar until the House had acted on the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe the Senators are correct about the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RESEARCH IN PACIFIC OCEAN FISHERIES

The bill (S. 3989) to provide for the construction and operation of a vessel for use in research work with respect to Pacific Ocean fisheries was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DISTINGUISHED FLYING CROSS TO LINCOLN ELLSWORTH

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3770) to award the Distinguished Flying Cross to Lincoln Ellsworth, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, to strike out the words "the President of the United States is hereby authorized to award the Distinguished Flying Cross" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "by act of Congress, a special gold medal be awarded", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That by act of Congress, a special gold medal be awarded to Lincoln Ellsworth, noted American explorer and outstanding pioneer in exploratory aviation in the Arctic and Antarctica, for his exceptionally meritorious services to science and aeronautics in making a 2,500-mile aerial survey of the heart of Antarctica to determine if it is a solid land mass or divided by a frozen sea, thus paving the way for more detailed studies of geological, meteorological, and geographical questions of world-wide importance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to award a special gold medal to Lincoln Ellsworth."

Mr. BARBOUR. I should like to make a brief statement at this time, if I may, with respect to Senate bill 3770, which was introduced by my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and which has just been passed.

I wish to express my pleasure at this recognition of Lincoln Ellsworth, a fellow resident of my State of New Jersey and a neighbor of mine in the borough of Rumson, Monmouth County.

I wish to express thus publicly to the senior Senator from California my appreciation of his having introduced this bill to award the gold medal recommended by the War Department to Lincoln Ellsworth. My only regret is that I myself did not introduce this measure. But no matter; that is a distinction without a difference, and the bill has come before the Senate under better auspices anyway.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill signalizes the second instance in which the Congress has done honor to the name and services of Mr. Lincoln Ellsworth. In 1928, if my memory serves me correctly, I myself was prompted to introduce and promote the passage of a measure similar to this one in honor of the services and experiences of Mr. Ellsworth. That measure was approved May 29, 1928, and was in recognition of Mr. Ellsworth's polar flight made in 1925 and 1926.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2694) to add certain lands to the Columbia National Forest in the State of Washington was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like some explanation as to the provisions of the bill, which proposes to add 80,000 acres to this forest.

If no one present can explain the bill, I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3580) granting and confirming to the East Bay Municipal Utility District, a municipal utility district of the State of California, and a body corporate and politic of said State, and a political subdivision thereof, certain lands, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

OUACHITA NATIONAL FOREST

The bill (S. 3445) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to release the claim of the United States to certain land within the Ouachita National Forest, Ark., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized to execute a quitclaim deed to Andrew Jackson Talley and Becca Adeline Talley, releasing all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the following-described lands:

Lots 5 and 6 in the northeast quarter section 2, township 4 north, range 24 west, fifth principal meridian, and that part of lots 7 and 8 in the northeast quarter of said section 2, described as follows:

Beginning at a point on the north line of lot 8 which is 8.70 chains west from the northeast corner of said lot and is a point in the center of the creek; thence upstream with the meanders of the creek, and following the thread thereof, south 59° west 1.40 chains; south 69° west exactly 1 chain; south 82°30' west exactly 3 chains; south 86° west exactly 1 chain; south 55° west exactly 1 chain; south 66° west exactly 2 chains; south 74° west exactly 3 chains; north 61° west 1.75 chains; north 55° west exactly 2 chains; south 77°30' west 1.25 chains; north 85° west 1.75 chains; north 13° west exactly 2 chains, which is a point on the north line of said lot 7; thence east with the north line of said lots 7 and 8 to the point of beginning, containing an area of 83.19 acres more or less.

MARKER OF SITE OF ENGAGEMENT FOUGHT AT COLUMBUS, GA.

The bill (H. R. 9200) authorizing the erection of a marker suitably marking the site of the engagement fought at Columbus, Ga., April 16, 1865, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOOD CONTROL

The bill (S. 3531) to amend the act entitled "An act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes, approved May 15, 1928," was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill is of great importance. I express the hope that it may be taken up for consideration in the early future.

The proponents of the bill, including the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], realize that it would not be possible to secure action under the present unanimous-consent order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in that connection I desire to say that I hope no effort will be made by the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] or the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to take up this bill until the Senate Commerce Committee, which is now studying a national flood-control bill, shall have had an opportunity to consider the whole matter and to report on it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I may say to the Senator from Oregon that the bill just called—Senate bill 3531, being Calendar No. 1731—has relationship to one important phase of the subject of flood control. It does not purport or attempt to deal with the problem on the tributaries of the Mississippi, except in a very limited way.

I myself had hoped that the House bill, which passed during the next to the last day of the last session, and which I myself was instrumental in causing the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] promptly and hastily to report, and which bill was taken up in the Senate during the very last day of the session, and finally, at the insistence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], was recommitted, might have reached the calendar before this time.

I know that the Commerce Committee has been very busy and that it has been diligent in studying the subject, and it is my understanding that the committee will be able to report in the early future.

If it meets the approval of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], I suggest that the Senator from Louisiana and myself, with others who are interested, confer in the immediate future as to procedure.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say that the Committee on Commerce have been diligent, as our leader has said. We have been having hearings with the War Department through the past 2 weeks. We now have before the committee a tentative bill which will be taken up for consideration by the committee on Monday morning next at 10:30.

The bill to which I refer does not include the projects included in the Overton bill, but it includes other projects; and I assume that on Monday additions may be made to the bill.

I think it proper to make this statement, because, as chairman of the committee, I am anxious to have Senators who are interested and who have projects which they think are meritorious and should be added to the bill, communicate with the committee, either in person on Monday or in writing before that time, in order that we may know what the desires of individual Senators may be.

In this bill we have attempted to establish a yardstick. That never has been done with reference to flood control. It has been done with reference to river and harbor appropriations, but never with reference to flood control. If the committee does not vary from its apparent intention, no project will be included in the bill unless it has received the approval of the Army engineers and is considered meritorious by that Board.

I may say, Mr. President, that the committee is to meet on Monday at 10:30 o'clock in the Commerce Committee room. The whole committee will be there at that time, and if there are Senators who wish to be heard, I hope they will "speak then or forever hold their peace", because if we are to pass this bill it will involve a long conference, and it is necessary that there should be speedy action.

I refer not only to the general bill but also to other bills which, I assume, will be presented in the near future in order to determine what shall be our attitude regarding these various problems.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course it would not be possible now to determine whether the Senate will attempt to combine the two bills or let them proceed separately. It has been thought by some that the two measures—I am referring now to the Overton bill and to the omnibus levee and reservoir bill, which is the one that is still pending in the Commerce Committee—relate to different phases of flood control; and the question will arise, if it does not now arise, as to whether the bills shall be proceeded with separately, or whether an effort shall be made to combine them.

It will be recalled that at the last session, during the last few hours of the session, we hastily brought forward the omnibus levee and reservoir bill, which has relation to the control of floods on the tributaries of the Mississippi, and that during the debate which followed there was much ridicule, or attempted ridicule, of the provisions of the measure. I wish the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who indulged in that remarkable display of humor, were present. I should like to call his attention to the fact that the Senate has just passed a House bill authorizing a preliminary examination of Marshy Hope Creek, a tributary of the Nanticoke River, at and within a few miles of Federalsburg, Caroline County, Md., with a view to controlling floods.

Mr. President, events of the past few days have given added significance and emphasis to the importance of flood-control legislation. When a great flood occurs in any community there follows an agitation in favor of action to prevent its recurrence. Differences then arise as to what had best be done; conflicts of opinion manifest themselves, and very little is accomplished. The years go by, and the currents gather their murky volumes and work destruction in their progress toward the sea; and again there is revived an agitation in favor of flood control, only to take the same course as in the past.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield in a moment. In 1928 the Congress of the United States passed a comprehensive measure providing for projects for the control of floods within the alluvial valley of the Mississippi and on the tributaries of the Mississippi. The project as to the alluvial valley has been partially worked out; it has not been completed for the reason that public opposition to a prospective floodway became so great that the Federal authorities did not see fit to proceed with it.

The Overton bill, in my judgment, works out that problem, and works it out in accordance with the well-considered plans of the engineers. Almost every dispute touching that feature of flood control, namely, control of floods on the Mississippi or in its alluvial valley, has been settled, and the project is ready for action.

No one more than I realizes the importance of controlling floods on the tributary streams. The truth is that complete control cannot be accomplished without the construction of more levees and the creation of reservoirs.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield now to the Senator from New York.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I am simply calling attention to the matter. I do not wish to yield further if title to the floor will thereby be taken away from me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. That is all right.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Confirmatory of what the Senator from Arkansas has said, it is very probable if the bill which we had before us last year, which was recommitted to the committee by reason of the speech of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] had been passed and the control measures contemplated by the bill had been installed, the flood in Pittsburgh this year would not have occurred.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. I wish to add to what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said with respect to Senate bill 3531, known as the Overton bill, that the bill does not present for the consideration of Congress any new projects at all. The main purpose of the bill is to carry into execution the flood-control project adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, known as the Jadwin plan. The work under that plan and the work authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1928 is, roughly speaking, about half completed.

After the enactment of the act of 1928, the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Army Engineers, acting under a resolution adopted by the Flood Control Committee of the other House, made a resurvey and reexamination of the project for the control of floods in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River, and the Chief of Army Engineers submitted a report in February 1935 suggesting certain modifications of that plan. The purpose of Senate bill 3531 is to adopt the engineering recommendations made by General Markham in modification of the adopted plan. A further purpose is to authorize additional funds to carry the work into execution.

I will say, Mr. President, that the bill for the control of floods in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River differs from the omnibus flood-control bill and from any other bill relating to flood-control projects in this respect: That the Federal Government has adopted a national policy that flood control in the lower valley of the Mississippi shall be undertaken by the Government itself.

It further differs in this important particular, that the plan referred to in the Overton bill, to be modified according to the recommendation of General Markham as suggested in the Overton bill, has been recommended by the Mississippi River Commission, by the Chief of Engineers, by General Jadwin, by his successor, General Brown, and by the present Chief of Engineers, General Markham. There has not been any project ever submitted to Congress that has had more earnest and thorough consideration, investigation, and study than has the plan referred to in this bill.

I therefore hope that this bill may be considered in the immediate future; and I also express the hope that it will be considered separately and independently from other proposed flood-control legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the fact that the Overton bill, which is now on the calendar, is based upon a policy heretofore adopted by Congress accepting the responsibility in dealing with the Mississippi River as a separate national flood-control situation, is there any reason why the consideration of the bill should await the report of the committee on another bill containing a large number of miscellaneous projects, which are simply to be surveyed before any action can be taken by Congress? I ask the Senator if there is any real connection between them?

Mr. McNARY. I shall answer that question. I have the floor now, and I have been very gracious in yielding, I think.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Oregon is always very gracious.

Mr. McNARY. And I should now like to proceed.

I am not here opposing at this time, nor is it my purpose to oppose the so-called Overton bill.

Answering the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], this bill deals with the same subject matter as does the omnibus bill, namely, flood control, arresting the angry waters of turbulent streams throughout the country. While it deals with the lower reaches of the Mississippi River, it is just as important to deal with the reaches of other rivers throughout the country.

It is true that in 1928—I recall it, because I happened to be a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce when the action was taken—Congress adopted the plan with respect to the Mississippi River. Why? Because that reached back to prior legislation which comprehended flood control limited to the Mississippi River and the Sacramento River. At that particular time, or the year following, I tried to have an amendment written into the law making flood control under the responsibility of the Federal Government applicable to the great Columbia River of the Pacific Northwest.

I am not opposing the Overton bill as it stands, but I say it is not good legislative practice to take up separately that bill, which treats of flood control on a principle different from that outlined in the so-called omnibus bill which is now being considered by the Committee on Commerce, and on which a report will be made in the near future. The two ought to go together. We must study this whole problem from a national standpoint. One who lives on the banks of the Arkansas River, of the Suwannee River, or the Wabash River, or that most delightful of all rivers, the Columbia River, is entitled to the same protection from the Federal Government as is anyone who lives on the banks of "Old Man River"—the Mississippi.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to say that, so far as I am individually concerned, I am in sympathy with the assumption of responsibility by the National Government with respect to all rivers that are causing damage, or may cause damage, by the overflow of their waters, but the provisions of the Overton bill were not included in the omnibus bill which was discussed at the end of the last session and recommitted to the committee. The omnibus bill is largely a bill for surveys seeking information.

Mr. McNARY. Not at all. The Senator is not conversant with the philosophy of the bill and its terms.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, many of the items provided for surveys, and some were authorizations; but the stream of ridicule which was directed at that bill, which largely was responsible for its recommitment, was because of surveys which were provided for and not because of authorizations.

What I started to say was that that bill has passed the House and is now in the Senate Committee on Commerce. The Overton bill has passed neither House, and while both bills deal with floods, there is no necessary connection between the two from a legislative standpoint, although it would be desirable, as it always is, for all subjects pertaining to a given policy to be included in the same bill.

Mr. McNARY. They deal with the same subject matter, namely, the Government's attitude and contributions with respect to the control of the floodwaters of streams throughout the country. When we are dealing with a subject matter and it affects one section of the country as it does another, are we to favor one section over another, or shall we grasp the whole problem and study it from that angle? When we had the A. A. A. measure here did we consider just the effect it had on farmers in the South who produce cotton? No. We treated it from a national standpoint. I am appealing only for a fair and decent plan of legislation for the country at large, and that the Overton bill be not taken up until the omnibus bill may be brought before the Senate and a general policy formulated.

Let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that to my mind one of the policies we should determine is how far we are to exact cooperation from those who suffer because of the floodwaters of our angry streams. A plan was brought to me yesterday by one of the generals on the Board of Army Engineers to provide that reservoirs should be built solely at Government expense, and that for some sections of the country levee districts should be established and flood-control organizations created, for which the farmers themselves would burden their property to take care of floodwaters. In other sections there is a requirement of cooperation on the basis of 50 to 75 percent and as low as 25 percent. Are we going to adopt the policy of noncooperation with some individuals and districts who are protected? Shall one plan apply to the lower reaches of the Mississippi and another to the rivers of New England or of the Middle West or of the far West?

In fairness, my suggestion ought to appeal to the good sense of anyone who is interested in logical and proper legislation. The suggestion is merely that some plan, which is national in its character, should be devised for flood control, because floods are just as disastrous in one section as in another, and we should have a plan which will operate equally in all sections of the country. It is for that reason and in the interest of wise legislation and fair and equitable treatment of all regions of the country that I request, and I insist, so far as I can, that the Overton bill be not taken up until the Commerce Committee can report to this body what it believes should be the future policy of the Government with respect to the control of the floodwaters of our streams.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Commerce Committee has had both bills under consideration, the omnibus bill and the Overton bill. We cannot assume the Commerce Committee is derelict in the performance of its duties if it did not see fit to combine the two measures, but has reported the Overton bill for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I am not interested in any assumption that may be made. If the Senator from Kentucky knew something about the subject matter, he might discuss it with much more understanding. Just yesterday General Pillsbury was before the committee with an entirely new scheme that does not involve cooperation. We have not as yet had copies of the bill for members of the committee to read. It is for that particular reason, among others, that I suggest that the Overton bill, which centralizes itself and localizes itself on one part of a mighty stream, should rest in peace on the calendar of the Senate until a plan is suggested to the Senate by the committee now considering the subject matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Oregon seems to be unusually agitated this afternoon and in a frame of mind which induces him to be snappy at his fellow Senators without the slightest justification. I merely stated that the same committee which has the omnibus bill before it has considered the Overton bill and reported them separately, to which the Senator replied I did not know what I was talking about. The record, I believe, shows the bill was reported March 5, 1936, long after both bills had been considered by the committee during all of this session.

My remark merely was directed to an inquiry as to why the committee charged with responsibility as to all this legislation have seen fit to report this bill. I said it was because the committee thought it was worthy of consideration and had not sought to combine it with the omnibus bill now before the committee and which may or may not be acted on in the near future.

Mr. McNARY. I have tried to make it clear to the Senator that the Commerce Committee reported the omnibus bill. Later on it was returned to the Army engineers for further consideration. Yesterday the Board of Army Engineers submitted through one of its members a different plan altogether, which, if adopted, will apply to every section of the country.

It is my attitude and my belief that such a plan, general in its application, should be considered by the Senate.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I am very much in sympathy with the suggestion that there should be adopted a national policy with reference to flood control generally throughout the Nation. I do not mean by that that on every little stream which happens to overflow its banks flood-control works should be provided by the Federal Government.

I wish to assure the Senator from Oregon that, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I should be very glad indeed to cooperate with him in the formulation of a bill which would properly express the policy the Federal Government ought to adopt. However, I wish to call his attention to this difference between the omnibus bill and my bill.

No policy whatsoever has been adopted by the Federal Government in respect to all the various projects which are incorporated in this great bill. On the other hand, 8 years ago the Federal Government adopted a policy with reference to the control of floods in the lower Mississippi Valley. The purpose of my bill is not to ask Congress to consider what policy should be adopted in reference to the lower Mississippi Valley, because that policy has already been adopted. In respect to the omnibus flood-control bill, a policy should be carefully considered and carefully formulated. The chairman of the Commerce Committee has been working with that object in view. A bill has been tentatively prepared and submitted announcing such a policy.

But why should the lower Mississippi Valley wait on flood-control projects stretching from California to Maine when the Federal Government has already formulated such a policy, has spent over $200,000,000 in prosecuting that work, and if not further prosecuted, the work which has been done will be practically worthless and the money which the Federal Government has spent will have been wasted?

As has been pointed out, the omnibus flood-control bill has already passed the House. It has been considered by the Senate Commerce Committee, reported to the Senate, referred back to the Commerce Committee, and again reported by that committee. But my bill has not been considered by the House. After it shall have been passed by the Senate it will have to go to the House and be acted on there. I fear that while we are awaiting a formula to be applied with reference to the other flood-control projects, unrelated to the project covered by my bill, it will be too late to secure the passage of my bill through both branches of Congress.

Mr. McNARY. Let me assure the Senator that I shall take no action which will unnecessarily delay the consideration of his bill. I am only seeking cooperation along a line which I think will be advantageous to the country. Inasmuch as the Commerce Committee is to report within a few days on a general plan, I suggest to the Senator that he do not push his bill until that time. I think he is entitled to have both the House and the Senate consider his bill. I always believe in giving every Senator who has a bill on the calendar an opportunity to be heard. I shall be glad at the proper time to cooperate with the Senator, but at this time I think it would be unfortunate to consider his bill and leave the omnibus bill yet to be considered.

That is the nature of the request I make to the Senator, and in it I think he should concur.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, let me make a further observation, if the Senator will permit me to take up part of his time.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. General Markham made his report to Congress in February of last year as to a modification of the Jadwin plan. The House Flood Control Committee considered that plan and held extended hearings thereon. No bill was reported. In the meantime the work of execution of the Jadwin plan, while it has not exactly ceased, has been considerably abated.

Now let me make a further observation. As the Senator from Oregon very well knows, the omnibus flood-control bill relates, while not exclusively, very largely to the construction of reservoirs; and the thought back of the omnibus flood-control bill is to build such detention reservoirs in the headwaters of streams and their tributaries in order to prevent floods. But the Jadwin plan, as proposed to be modified under the recommendations of General Markham, does not deal with reservoirs, except in one or two isolated instances, but is a well-considered, well-thought-out, successful plan of controlling the flood waters in the lower Mississippi Valley by a system of levees and floodways. It is the most economical plan that can be adopted; it is the most practical plan that has been suggested; and, if carried into execution, it will solve the flood-control problem of the lower valley.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is no subject coming before this Congress of greater importance than that which is being generally discussed at this time.

The overflow of streams in the East and the Northeast during the past few weeks has brought upon peoples and communities deserving protection a situation which has confronted millions of people in the Mississippi Valley from the beginning of the history of the country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINN in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to emphasize what the Senator has said about recent events awakening the country to an appreciation of the necessity for flood control.

We of New England have never thought that flood control was an activity of the Government which ought especially to interest us. Our streams have many dams upon them, built close together, and we have felt that these numerous dams would sufficiently protect us from flood; but we have had a terrible awakening.

I heard a man say the other day that the catastrophe which has recently happened to New England is the greatest catastrophe which has happened in the United States during the history of the country. That possibly may be exaggerated; but because our cities and towns are numerous and close together on our rivers, with a large number of mills built on their banks, mills which employ thousands of people, all of which have been damaged, and many hundreds of thousands thrown out of work, we have a very serious problem, aside from the tremendous damage to property.

I desire to emphasize what the Senator said—that even those portions of the country which did not realize before what flood control meant are now realizing it, and are desirous that some action be taken promptly to prevent the loss of human life and the destruction of public and private property and the increasing unemployment that have been the result.

I thank the Senator for permitting me to interject these statements.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the people in the areas referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts are now, for the first time in my lifetime, conscious of the intensity and importance of the problem of flood control.

Mr. WAGNER. As a matter of national concern?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. There has been a disposition—it has been manifested in the past few months here in the Senate—to treat flood control as a matter of mere local concern.

In 1928 the Congress of the United States, by formal legislative enactment, declared the control of floods in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River to be a national problem, and its legislation was based upon that principle and theory.

From 41 to 43 percent of the territory of the United States is drained through "Old Man River." No amount of activity or attention or sacrifice on the part of peoples dwelling within the basins of tributary streams can give protection against the combined wrath and force of the waters which are gathered from half the territory of the United States and emptied into the Gulf of Mexico through the Mississippi.

Flood control is recognized in the law referred to by the Senator from Louisiana and by myself in previous remarks as a national problem; but its importance has not been realized in many sections of the country, because persons living in those sections have not seen what a devastating flood means. They have not listened through long, dark nights while the angry lightnings were flashing and the deep-voiced thunders rolling, to the rush and roar of maddened waters with force and power irresistible. Palaces and hovels have been swept away, persons enjoying abundance one day have been impoverished the next, all because of flood waters from streams.

A dam cannot be built in a navigable stream, a levee cannot be erected without interfering with the prerogatives of the Government. As the years have gone by, and the forests have been destroyed, the timber cut away and soil erosion increased and augmented, the problem has increased in magnitude. Floods now occur where they did not take place before; and during the very hours when Pittsburgh and Hartford, Conn., and thousands of other towns in the East were being washed away, dust storms occurred in other parts of the country, darkening the sun, indicating the existence of a condition which demands action not by a single community, not by a county, not by a State alone, but by all the communities and all the counties and all the States.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] is right in the assumption that the problem ought not to be treated in a local way; but I am telling him what I believe he already knows when he thinks about it, that a sound flood-control policy applying to all the States and Territories cannot be formulated within a few hours. Millions of dollars must first be spent, and the best engineering brains at our command must be employed, to find out what can be done, and to determine what had best be done; and if we wait until the plan is complete for every section of the country, we shall have a recession of the tide of public opinion which will make for further delay.

Talk about the Commerce Committee of the Senate—composed, as it is, of some of the most intelligent and useful Members of this body—working out between now and Monday, and reporting, an adequate, sound bill for the control of floods throughout the United States. If we do not know any more about it than to assume that that can be done, we had better take up the primers again and resume our primary studies.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Assuming that it is desirable that there should be established a national policy on this subject, and that the flood-control bill now before the Commerce Committee will eventually outline that policy and determine what shall be done in building reservoirs, and all that sort of thing, in different places—different things in different localities—what has that to do with a project plans and specifications for which and the authorization for which have already been fixed? Whatever national policy may be developed in the omnibus bill will have to do for the future. Am I right about that?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. And will not interfere with this project.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was approaching that aspect of the problem, with a full consciousness of its importance. I resume where I left off, that however courageous, intelligent, and active our great committee may be, we need not expect it to report a bill next Monday, or even next month, which its members will regard and advocate as a complete plan for the control of floods throughout the United States. The most that can be expected—remember this—is a partial solution of the problem, recommendations for projects which have been surveyed, leaving important aspects of this subject for future study and determination.

I would give everything I possess in this world if there could be brought into this body, of which for a time I have the honor to be a Member, a measure which would be generally regarded as approximately correct, designed and calculated to give adequate or reasonable protection to the various communities in this country against the ravages of great floods.

The engineers usually require months, and in a few instances years, to make those researches and surveys which are essential to sound and wise procedure. We cannot go out and build a dam or a dike or a reservoir just where anybody may suggest that it should be. We must know, insofar as scientific knowledge can inform us, that if we raise a levee, or build a reservoir, if we provide a floodway, it will be effective for the purposes in mind; and in order to find out what levees and what reservoirs and what floodways are necessary many engineers must be called to service, and they must be given the time necessary to ascertain the facts and to reach conclusions.

Nothing would please me better than to have brought to the Senate next week, or tomorrow, if it were possible, a bill which you and I would say would do the work; but I know it is not going to be done, because it cannot be done; it is a physical impossibility.

Then the question arises whether we shall postpone all action until such a time as the countless hundreds, aye thousands, of streams in the United States will make it possible for the Congress to determine what works are required.

In 1928 Congress adopted as a national policy flood control in the Mississippi Valley. It had a general plan for the control of floods on the streams that has scarcely been touched. Very little has been done toward carrying out that plan insofar as the tributaries of the Mississippi are concerned.

The project for control in the lower Mississippi Valley is proposed to be modified by the Overton bill in accordance, in most particulars, with the best judgment of the engineers. It is not necessary to wait until a survey has been made of a river in Maine or Massachusetts to know what to do there. We know what is necessary to be done. We have the technical information required. If we wait until all the surveys which will be necessary have been made and all the projects which will be required have been approved by the Congress, we will see flood after flood; we will see Red Cross ambulances with their beautiful emblems dashing along the highways carrying relief. In the meantime hundreds of lives will be lost and millions of dollars worth of property will be destroyed.

In the floods which have taken place in the East and the Northeast during the last week or 10 days it is estimated that more than $300,000,000 worth of property has been destroyed.

Mr. WALSH. Without any insurance.

Mr. ROBINSON. And more than 178 lives have been lost. Of course it is right, and of course it is necessary, to work out and put into effect programs to prevent the recurrence of such calamities. But we cannot do it tonight; we cannot do it tomorrow. The best that can be hoped for, responding to all the impulses that are prompted by present and recent occurrences, is that considerable time will be required before plans are ready and before we can know what we ought to do and what can be done. As fast as they are ready and as fast as you know what ought to be done, let me help you, if you please, to accomplish what is desired to be accomplished.

I have been in the habit of giving study to this subject for the past 30 years. My own eyes have witnessed some things which my memory often recalls. During the great flood of 1927 I received many telegrams to come to a certain city in the flood district, and I went there and asked what I was expected to do. The people there said, "We thought perhaps you could help maintain the morale of our people, that you could make some speeches at public meetings within this flood area. But first let us take you out on the river and show you what is occurring."

We drove out a concrete highway, built at local expense, to a point where the levee was threatened with a break, and on the way down they said: "No automobile passes over this highway except it is requisitioned for work in the flood. Sightseers have been coming here from adjoining States. We take them out of their automobiles, give them picks and shovels, and tell them to go to work on the levees. Our women have left their homes and are out here in tents cooking and taking care of flood refugees."

I saw women carrying emaciated little children in their arms, white and black, administering food and medicine to them and trying at times to lull them to sleep, and all the while the current was flowing in against the levee, and men were working and relieving each other in shifts, staying right there. The town had almost been abandoned. No one knew what the result would be.

By accident, some person suggested a simple plan. He suggested that cotton bagging be laid against the levee and that rock and dirt be piled on it, using it as a kind of revetment; and, fortunately, it held.

After 2 or 3 days I went back; and on every mound that appeared above the surface of the water I saw groups of women and children gathered about little fires, partaking of food that had been supplied to them. Here and there I saw men and women still at work. A song of triumph was going up from the hundreds of black men working on the levee. A shout of joy was reverberating through the overflowed region. The effort succeeded.

Since I witnessed that incident I have been ready to do everything within my power to provide protection to the communities that are threatened with destruction by the waters of rivers owned by the United States.

It seems to me that the wise and the fair thing to do is to go forward with determination, taking all the advice that can be obtained from all the scientific agencies that are available in the Government and from private sources. Obtain the information that is necessary to formulate comprehensive plans; but, in the meantime, when a plan has been made and agreed on, do not wait for another overflow before taking action to prevent overflows. Proceed as soon as we are ready to proceed. If we do that, in the course of a few years we shall have in effect a comprehensive program for the control of floods throughout the United States.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I am today in receipt of a copy of a letter published in the Milwaukee Journal, Milwaukee, Wis., written by O. J. Gromme, a prominent citizen of Milwaukee, who discusses very interestingly the question of flood control. I think this is an appropriate place in the Record to have that letter set forth; and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

MILWAUKEE PUBLIC MUSEUM,
March 24, 1936.

To the CITY EDITOR:

This morning the newspaper headlines are screaming the plight of the people engulfed in the great flood and showing pictures from its scenes of horror and devastation unparalleled in the history of our country. Walls of water beyond human control are causing an appalling loss of life and property and all attempts to stem the flow are futile. Strange as it may seem, at the same time Milwaukeeans while reading this morning's news are choking in a cloud of yellow dust which all but blots out the sun. In our own country we are at the same time the victims of two of Nature's greatest cataclysms—drought and flood.

It hardly seems possible that in this age of enlightenment and scientific knowledge civilized man will permit Nature's furies to engulf him. Here in Wisconsin we feel quite content in the false security and belief that we are far removed from scenes of drought and flood. Scientists remind us that the encroachment is rapidly creeping northward and the dust that is choking us today is the precious top soil borne to us by the wind out of drought-stricken areas. Often do we hear the remark, "Poor drought- and flood-stricken China." I wonder if the unpleasant reminders of today right here in our midst do not pretty thoroughly show us up in the same light to the Chinese and particularly to nations more progressive in the vital function of conservation of natural resources, particularly water and forest resources.

Frantic efforts are being made by the Government to aid our unfortunates in time of distress. The cry right at this moment is for bigger and better levees and deeper channels through which our precious water and top soil is to be delivered via fast express to help build up the Mississippi Delta and add more water to the floods. Millions and millions are to be spent for this type of engineering. I wonder if it has ever occurred to our Army engineers that the way to check floods is at their source. When a doctor is confronted with an infection, he usually looks for the cause. It seems to me and to many others who have given the above problems most serious consideration, that both flood and drought can be checked right here in our Northern States. Now, to put the horse before the cart for a change, we can have permanent relief instead of a patchwork of temporary salving in the form of levees and channels. In time the gradual deposition of silt and continuous and expensive raising of levees in the South will make aqueducts instead of rivers of our southern waterways and at the same time will give us no relief as a whole.

If again we place the horse before the cart, the logical suggestion would be the impounding of flood waters right here in Wisconsin and other Northern States where wise Nature made lavish provision in the form of millions of acres of natural reservoirs and other millions of acres for forest growth. In both cases our senseless and wasteful method of deforestation and so-called marsh reclamation have proven that the land originally intended by Nature for that purpose can adequately serve that purpose only. In Horicon alone our State could, for example, impound 44,000 acres of water at depths varying from 1 to 6 feet. Cut up by drainage ditches as it now is, the consequent rapid outflow is most certainly not relieving the flood situation in the South. All drained marshes in northern United States added together will give us the sum total of the great flood.

Humanity will be far better served by the temporary flooding of marginal and useless farmland than pouring the water in a devastating current down the main street of some American metropolis. With restoration of all our northern United States marshes and the natural basins, these tremendous areas can be made to give up impounded water during the summer drought and gradually during winter months, and made ready to hold the overflow of spring freshets. The whole scheme is so simple that to neglect such an opportunity in the face of disaster would be laughable if it were not so tragic. The function of forests in shading snows from too rapid melting and from the standpoint of moisture absorption is too well known to cite here.

Certain of our economists and legislators propound numerous ideas to place money into the hands of the needy farmer. Could not some of this money be made to serve a manifold service of distribution of wealth and at the same time a redistribution and permanent maintenance of water levels and flood relief? Flood control must be national and not the plaything of prejudice and, still worse, local politics. Would it not be wise, economical, and timely that the United States take over definite control of all overflow basins in all States? Outright purchase of submarginal marshlands will aid the needy farmer and give Government control to floodwaters at their source and not lack of control where the damage is being done.

It is a well-known fact that it takes water to make rain and that rain clouds sometimes travel thousands of miles before giving their moisture back to Mother Earth. If we are to have evenly distributed rainfall and real flood control, we shall be very wise to recreate or restore our natural water levels by undoing the damnable work done by drainage and by standing solidly behind a Nation-wide reforestation program. Here is an opportunity for Government and State to realize an enormous return on an investment made now while we have opportunity to receive money under the Works Progress Administration. Road building is expensive and most worthy, but it seems that we are facing another national emergency from floods and the encroachment of desert conditions. It will take millions of men to rebuild the damage done by drainage and deforestation. We would, indeed, be wise to repair this damage now and, as I see it, we have a most excellent opportunity in our State.

O. J. GROMME,
Milwaukee Public Museum.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, inasmuch as our illustrious and able leaders on both sides of the Chamber have violated the 5-minute rule under which we are now proceeding, I suppose if a similar violation shall take place on the part of one of the rank and file there will not be any objection to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the subject of flood control, in my judgment, is the most important subject for Nation-wide discussion. I desire to call attention, as I have often done before, to the fact that the proper way to control floods is to consider streams as a whole, and to build the necessary dams with reference to the complete control of the entire streams.

If we begin now with a systematic control of our flood waters, it probably will take 100 years before the job will be finished; but we shall begin to get the benefits of it within a short time after we commence that kind of control.

I desire for just a moment to discuss the great Mississippi River Basin. As I see it, one of our major undertakings should be the control of the floodwaters of the streams of the Nation. There ought to be projects of a similar nature on the Pacific coast, on the Atlantic coast, perhaps on the Gulf of Mexico, perhaps on some of the Great Lakes; but the Mississippi River Valley flood-control project probably will be greater than any other.

Since I have been in public life we have spent literally hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to control the floods of the Mississippi by building levees on the lower stretches of the river. A systematic control running over years, with a view of making as far as we can a complete control, would, as I see it, mean that we should begin on the tributaries of the Mississippi River, and wherever nature has made a place for a large reservoir we should hold a large amount of floodwaters, and utilize those, commencing with the largest ones, and continuing from year to year as we were able to expend the money to hold back other floods in other areas and other tributaries, doing that systematically after a careful survey and investigation by competent engineers, and in that way controlling the major part of the floods that do damage in Mississippi and Louisiana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Confirming what the Senator has just said, only yesterday the Army engineers made a report on flood control of the Connecticut River. The greater portion of the damage done by the Connecticut River was to the cities on the lower portion of the river—Hartford, Springfield, Holyoke, Chicopee, Northampton, Greenfield, and adjoining towns. The Army engineers propose the construction of 10 reservoirs. Where would those reservoirs be located? Up in Vermont and New Hampshire, miles and miles away from where the river damage was done.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I believe that is the proper scientific way, and, in fact, the only way, in which we eventually shall control the floodwaters of our inland waterways.

Incidentally, Mr. President, it will be found that flood control is intimately connected with navigation; and, as I see it, and as I read the Supreme Court decisions, we shall have to connect flood control with navigation in order to make our legislation constitutional. I think we can easily do this, because it follows as night follows day that if we should control all the floodwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, every reservoir we provided with a dam in front of it to hold back the floodwaters would improve the navigation of the Mississippi River, and make navigable some of its tributaries that now are not navigable, and improve the navigability of other tributaries. So the two purposes will dovetail, navigation being the basis, the constitutional peg upon which will hang flood-control legislation, for it will improve navigation in the great West, the land to the west of the Mississippi River. Another object might be added, namely, irrigation.

Mr. President, the best way in the world to store floodwaters is to store them in the soil. We cannot store all the waters in the soil, but irrigation projects will take up a great deal of the floodwaters. Flood control and navigation are proper charges against the Federal Government. Irrigation projects would in part be paid for by those who use the water, thus putting it to a beneficial use instead of permitting it to do damage farther down in the Mississippi River Valley.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. In connection with the suggestion as to irrigation, would not the use of water for irrigation purposes also help to solve another problem, that of dust storms?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. There is another thing which will fit into the program of flood control. If, on a given river, we systematically hunt out the basins that will hold flood waters, and build dams at their mouths to hold the flood waters, we shall generate in the aggregate an enormous amount of electric power. So, again, we come to an element that will help pay the expenses of the operation of the bill—navigation, irrigation, flood control, production of power, all put together, allocating to each one that part of the cost which should properly go to that particular element.

I was today told by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], who honors me with his presence and attention, about a flood-control dam in Pennsylvania. I had asked him how many acre-feet that dam would hold. Today he gave me information to the effect that it would hold something over 900,000 acre-feet. That is a large amount of water, but when it is compared with all the floodwaters of the Mississippi Basin it is small. We would have to have many such dams, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has said, but in the Allegheny Mountains, on the Monongahela River, on the Allegheny River, and on some other tributaries, other reservoirs could be located after proper survey where 500,000 or 700,000, or even less, acre-feet of water could be held back. If they were all put together, we would lessen the great danger of floods at Pittsburgh. When we lessen that danger at Pittsburgh we likewise lessen the danger at New Orleans.

Putting these thousands of things together we will have practically controlled the floods on the Mississippi River. We will have relieved the lower stretches of the Mississippi Valley from the damage which occurs every year or so from floods.

Mr. President, we have undertaken in one instance which I am now going to cite to develop a stream in a scientific way. I refer to the Tennessee River. Two or three years ago when we passed the Tennessee Valley Act the constitutional peg upon which that legislation hinged was to make the Tennessee River navigable. In order to make it navigable we built flood-control dams. We have just now completed a dam known as Norris Dam on one of the tributaries of the Tennessee River. That dam will hold back 3,500,000 acre-feet of water. That means water which would cover 3,500,000 acres 1 foot deep. We have authorized the construction of a flood-control dam at Hiawatha, which will not hold as much water as Norris Dam, but it will be comparable.

Another storage dam can be built on the Little Tennessee River which would store almost the same amount of water. Several other projects, known from flood-control surveys, would make the flow in the Tennessee River almost continuous the year around. The Tennessee River has the fault of most of the streams, particularly in the South, of getting very low and very high, too high for navigation a portion of the year and too low for navigation the remainder of the year. The other dams built on the streams are not of very great value as flood-control projects, but are necessary as navigation projects, and when they are all constructed and all put together under the law Congress has enacted will constitute a scientific demonstration of what we can do by an orderly system and by proper legislation in the control of the flood waters of any stream.

Incidentally, in the Tennessee River a large amount of power is developed. That has been the prominent point of discussion in connection with that project.

Some have believed there was nothing involved in the legislation but the production of power. However, power was only a byproduct. The navigability of the Tennessee River was the primary object and the constitutional object of the legislation. Power came as a necessary incident.

It will be the same with all the other streams if we develop them scientifically, as we can. For instance, we are now building a dam in Montana at Fort Peck, on the Missouri River, which when it is finished will hold back somewhere in the neighborhood of 17,000,000 acre-feet of water. We have just completed a dam at Boulder, Colo., which will form a lake 150 miles long and 700 to 800 feet deep at one end, holding back flood waters which have been pouring for hundreds of years, yes, for millions of years, down into the valley, destroying property, destroying human life. Now the water is going to be harnessed for the benefit, happiness, and comfort of mankind.

We can do this with every other stream in the United States. We can do this with the Mississippi River. We ought to go at it systematically. It will take years to complete the work. I understand, from talking with engineers, that there is a location on the Ohio River where a flood-control dam can be built which will be very expensive because of the land which it will overflow being well settled and cultivated. But if it had been built that one dam would have taken the crest of the last flood on the Mississippi River and saved hundreds of lives and hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property from destruction.

I look forward to the time when this great work will be undertaken. I do not expect to be here to see it finished, but I hope to see us start on the Mississippi Valley and, in a scientific way, harness the floodwaters that come from the sources, on the west from the Rocky Mountains and on the east from the Allegheny Mountains. We shall find in many cases, perhaps in most cases, that the dams that will control the floods will be constructed near the sources of these tributaries. We shall never make the system perfect. I realize that there always will be local floods, local rains; but the great damage which has come about in the past has resulted from floods coming from one direction happening to meet in the stream floods coming from the other direction; and in such cases danger and destruction of property and human life always result.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Without discussing the merits of the flood-control question, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think this consideration is worth while:

All States receive W. P. A. and P. W. A. work projects on somewhat of a general equation, so that the work shall be evenly distributed according to unemployment, and each State shall be treated generally in line with the treatment accorded other States.

So long as that policy holds, if one State shall receive in addition thereto twenty-five or thirty million dollars for flood-control projects, it is my thought that an equation ought to be worked out so that the work afforded by the twenty-five or thirty million dollar flood-control appropriation shall count against the W. P. A. or P. W. A. appropriation for that State. Otherwise we shall have spent by the Federal Government for work in one State twice as much money as is allotted to another State with no flood-control project in it, even though the latter State may have five times as much unemployment as the former State.

I simply bring out that point, not to take issue with what the Senator from Nebraska is saying, but to show the widespread effect and necessity of a comprehensive plan.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is much in what the Senator says. However, I was not discussing the subject from the P. W. A. standpoint. I was discussing it from what I believe to be the scientific, efficient standpoint that must be adopted if we are to protect this country from damage by floods.

Mr. President, when we put all these things together—irrigation wherever it can be used, flood control, navigation, the control of dust storms which will to a great degree enter into the matter, and the development of power—and see how they all dovetail together and how each one helps out the other, it seems to me we shall see how it is possible to carry out a uniform method of controlling the floods of all the streams of the United States and making the streams navigable. Do not forget that.

What does this plan mean in the Mississippi Valley? It means, if we carry it out, that a boat may start from Knoxville, Tenn.—it may almost do so now; with one or two more dams in the Tennessee River it will be possible—and go to St. Paul, New Orleans, or Pittsburgh. In the end, Mr. President, we shall have the most complete system of cheap inland transportation that there is in the world, so all these things will work together for the harmony and the happiness of all the people in that great valley. The same thing may be said of almost any other valley on the Atlantic coast or on the Pacific coast.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I agree with what the Senator has said with reference to reservoirs on the tributaries of the Mississippi River. However, the construction of reservoirs as flood-control factors, according to the statements made by the engineers, will not in itself be sufficient to deal with the problem.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me interrupt the Senator there.

I was a Member of this body when there came into it the authorization of an appropriation of $10,000,000 to prevent damage from floods of the Mississippi River. I offered an amendment, which on a roll call lacked only two or three votes of being adopted, providing for the payment by the Federal Government of one-half the cost of any irrigation dam built in the West in a stream whose waters, if it had not been for the dam, would have gone into the Mississippi River. That amendment was defeated. So far as I know, that was the beginning of the agitation of flood control by building dams wherever the proper area could be obtained to hold back enough floodwaters to pay for building the dams.

The Army engineers, however, laughed at me. The Army engineers said I was silly; I was foolish. They said that the flood waters could not be held back in that way. Now we are getting a following. We have just been told by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that in order to prevent a recurrence of the recent flood in the valley of the Connecticut River the Army engineers propose to go away back into the mountains to construct flood-control dams.

Mr. WALSH. And build 8 or 10 reservoirs.

Mr. NORRIS. And build 8 or 10 reservoirs to do it. That idea is not silly now. Those who were called dreamers, who once advocated the idea, are now sometimes even admitted into respectable society. The engineers formerly laughed at the idea, however, and said that what was proposed could not be done, and wished to build dikes and levees and let the water come down from all over that great valley and rush through a little bottle neck at New Orleans.

I do not object to building levees. I do not object to building additional channels to let the water out. That may be necessary; but the great floods which cause the greatest damage of all are going to be controlled by holding water in reservoirs that God Almighty has made, and letting it out when it is needed instead of its being let out when it will damage and destroy human life and property.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Nebraska has said; but I simply desire to call attention to the fact that, notwithstanding all the reservoirs that may be built upon the tributaries of the Mississippi, we shall still have floods in Louisiana and Arkansas and Mississippi and Missouri and down the alluvial valley unless the work proposed under the Jadwin plan and the Markham plan shall be completed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, when the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] rose, he suggested, with that gentle and good-humored sarcasm for which he is so justly famous, that several Senators had violated the rule by speaking over 5 minutes.

I have not this afternoon interpreted the occasion as one limiting Senators to 5 minutes; so, while the Senator's sarcasm was gentle and always good-humored, I do not believe it struck the mark. Moreover, I am of opinion that the Senators who this afternoon have discussed the flood menace, and have discussed the methods of controlling floods, have made a valuable contribution.

I now rise to suggest that after this most illuminating discussion, to which I have listened with information and enlightenment, I assume that the Senate will go right through with the calendar, because some of us have waited here for many hours hoping that bills in which we are interested may come up.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not believe it will be possible to complete the consideration of the calendar today. It is my purpose to ask unanimous consent that the present order shall be continued tomorrow until it shall be concluded, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I feel like apologizing to every Senator for making such a request, but I have a bill which is in the nature of an emergency measure. It is a very small bill, but it is, I might say, at the tail end of the calendar, and I hope I am not presuming—

Mr. FLETCHER. I have one there, too.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I shall not seek for myself a privilege to which others are equally entitled.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we may proceed for a time yet, may we not?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; we may proceed for a few minutes.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next bill in order on the calendar.

SITE FOR NAVAL AIR STATION, MIAMI, FLA.

The bill (H. R. 8372) to authorize the acquisition of lands in the vicinity of Miami, Fla., as a site for a naval air station and to authorize the construction and installation of a naval air station thereon was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is some merit in this bill, and the Acting Secretary of the Navy has suggested a substitute for it. If the substitute is agreed to, I shall not object to the passage of the bill; but unless the substitute is agreed to, I shall object to the consideration of the measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I note that the substitute to which the Senator refers is at the end of the report on the bill, and it was evidently considered in the House when the bill was acted on in the House. This is a bill which was passed in the House and was reported unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. I would not feel justified in accepting an amendment such as that suggested by the Senator. I would rather have the bill go over and take it up at another time if he insists on having it go over.

Mr. KING. That will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ACQUISITION OF LAND AT FORT ETHAN ALLEN, VT.

The bill (S. 3411) to authorize the acquisition of land for military purposes at Fort Ethan Allen, Vt., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, approximately 3,000 acres of land located in the State of Vermont near the Fort Ethan Allen artillery range, for use in enlarging the artillery range and for other military purposes. The purchase price of such land shall not exceed $175,000, and such land shall be warranted free of all encumbrances and when purchased shall be a part of Fort Ethan Allen.

THOMAS F. GARDINER

The bill (H. R. 8110) for the relief of Thomas F. Gardiner was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXAMINATION OF SAN JUAN RIVER

The bill (S. 3488) to provide for an examination and survey to determine the best utilization of the surplus waters of the San Juan River and to determine the feasibility and cost of storing such waters and of diverting them to the Rio Chama, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made to determine the best utilization of the surplus waters of the San Juan, a tributary of the Colorado River, and to determine the best possible use of such waters in the San Juan Basin without injury to the present users of the waters of the San Juan River and by diversion if feasible of a portion of such surplus waters to the Rio Chama, a tributary of the Rio Grande River, and to report the results of such surveys and examinations to the Congress as soon as possible. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the purposes of this act.

RESOLUTION AND BILL PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 239) to investigate the circumstances attending the removal of Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood from command of the Eighth Army Corps Area was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 70) for the relief of agriculture, the producers of livestock, and the producers of raw materials generally, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HENRY THORNTON MERIWETHER

The bill (S. 3581) for the relief of Henry Thornton Meriwether was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to order Henry Thornton Meriwether, formerly commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, to appear before a naval retiring board for the purpose of determining whether or not the disability complained of in his case originated in the line of duty in time of war: Provided, That if said naval retiring board finds that the said Henry Thornton Meriwether is now suffering from a disability incurred in the line of duty in time of war which renders him unfit to perform all the duties of the grade of commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, in time of war, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Henry Thornton Meriwether a commander, United States Naval Reserve Force, and to place him on the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and emoluments of that grade: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due because of the passage of this act.

NAVY CROSS TO J. HAROLD ARNOLD

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 179) authorizing the President to present in the name of Congress a Navy Cross to J. Harold Arnold.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the Navy Department opposes this joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I may say that I did not become acting chairman of the committee while this measure was under consideration.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator object to its going over, in view of the opposition of the Department?

Mr. WALSH. I do not object.

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AWARD OF DECORATIONS TO CERTAIN BRITISH NAVAL OFFICERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11053) authorizing the President to present the Distinguished Service Medal to Commander Percy Tod, British Navy, and the Navy Cross to Lt. Comdr. Charles deW. Kitcat, British Navy, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "Tod" and insert in lieu thereof "Todd", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to present the Distinguished Service Medal to Commander Percy Todd, British Navy, and the Navy Cross to Lt. Comdr. Charles A. deW. Kitcat, British Navy, in recognition of the skill and heroism displayed by these officers when the United States ship Fulton, en route from Hong Kong, British Crown colony, to Foochow, China, on March 14, 1934, was destroyed by fire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act authorizing the President to present the Distinguished Service Medal to Commander Percy Todd, British Navy, and the Navy Cross to Lt. Comdr. Charles A. deW. Kitcat, British Navy."

RELIEF OF WATER USERS ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4232) to create a commission, and to extend further relief to water users on United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created a commission to be composed of three members, one of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture from the personnel of the Department of Agriculture, and two of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, one from the personnel of the Department of the Interior, and one who shall be a landowner and water user under a United States reclamation project. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects, with particular reference to the ability of each such project to make payments of water-right charges without undue burden on the water users, district, association, or other reclamation organization liable for such charges. Such investigation shall include an examination and consideration of any statement filed with the commission, or the Department of the Interior, by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, or the water users thereof, and, where requested by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, said commission shall proceed to such project and hold hearings, the proceedings of which shall be reduced to writing and filed with its report. Said commission, after having made careful investigation and study of the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects and their probable present and future ability to meet such water-right charges, shall report to the Congress, at the beginning of the Seventy-fifth Congress, with its recommendations as to the best, most feasible, and practicable comprehensive permanent plan for such water-right payments, with due consideration for the development and carrying on of the reclamation program of the United States, and having particularly in mind the probable ability of such water users, districts, associations, or other reclamation organizations to meet such water-right charges regularly and faithfully from year to year, during periods of prosperity and good prices for agricultural products as well as during periods of decline in agricultural income and unsatisfactory conditions of agriculture.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, which shall be available for expenditure, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries in carrying out the provisions of this act. The commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act without regard to civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 3. That all of the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law", approved April 1, 1932, as amended, as relate to the deferment of payment of certain water-right charges, be, and all of the provisions thereof are hereby, further extended in like manner to all similar charges coming due for the year 1936: Provided, That water users accepting the benefits of the relief extended by this act shall pay interest on deferred payments at the rate of 2 percent from the date when said payment became due to and including the date of the expiration of the period of relief granted hereunder, said interest to be paid at the time of payment of the said water-right charges for 1936.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to extend to water users on Indian irrigation projects during the calendar year 1936 like relief to that provided in the acts of January 26, 1933 (47 Stat. 776), and March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1427), applicable to the calendar years 1931, 1932, and 1933: Provided, That water users accepting the benefits of the relief extended by this act shall pay interest on deferred payments at the rate of 2 percent from the date when said payment became due to and including the date of the expiration of the period of relief granted hereunder, said interest to be paid at the time of payment of the said water-right charges for 1936.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it needs an explanation, but I will be glad to make a statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see any report on the bill in my file.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this bill has to do with the extension of the moratorium to reclamation projects for 6 months. The House has passed a bill upon the same subject. It is my purpose to offer certain amendments which will expedite the passage of the measure by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. It merely extends the time 6 months?

Mr. BORAH. Six months.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall not object.

Mr. BORAH. In line 4, page 1, I move to strike out the words "one of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture from the personnel of the Department of Agriculture, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. On line 6, I move to strike out the word "two" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "all."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. In line 7, I move to strike out the word "one" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. On page 3, line 7, I move to strike out "$25,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move to strike out all of section 3 and to insert in lieu thereof a bill which was passed by the House of Representatives, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, beginning with line 15, it is proposed to strike out all of section 3 and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 3. That all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to further extend relief to water users on the United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects", approved June 13, 1935, are hereby further extended for the period of 1 year, so far as concerns 50 percent of the construction charges, for the calendar year 1936: Provided, however, That where the construction charge for the calendar year 1936 is payable in two installments the sum hereby extended shall be the amount due as the first of such installments. If payable in one installment, the due date for the 50 percent to be paid shall not be changed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the full implications of the amendment?

Mr. BORAH. The bill which is before the Senate provides for a moratorium of 1 year.

Mr. KING. I thought it was for 6 months.

Mr. BORAH. The effect of the amendment is a moratorium of 6 months. The House passed the bill providing for a moratorium of 6 months, and I have accepted the House amendment, so that it will make the bill when passed provide for a moratorium of 6 months.

Mr. KING. Does it extend to all reclamation projects?

Mr. BORAH. To all reclamation projects.

Mr. KING. Regardless of the capacity and the ability of some persons enjoying the reclamation projects to make payments? Does it exonerate all of them from payments?

Mr. BORAH. We have incorporated in the bill a provision for the appointment of a committee to determine how much can be paid by the respective projects at the end of 6 months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY DAY

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, may we not suspend operations under the agreement heretofore entered into until tomorrow?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will not the Senator allow the next measure on the calendar to be passed? It is a concurrent resolution recognizing April 6, 1936, as Army Day. It is very necessary that the concurrent resolution be passed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not object to the consideration of the concurrent resolution; but I do not know whether I am in favor of it or not; I have not read it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It carries no appropriation. It recognizes April 6 as Army Day, as has been done for several years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next order of business will be stated.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 30) to recognize April 6, 1936, as Army Day, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be passed over.

DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if any Senator thinks I am presumptuous at this juncture, I shall not be offended if objection is made, but the Department of Justice has for some time in a proper way urged upon me to try to secure the passage of House bill 11098, to provide for terms of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, to be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate authorized me at its meeting last Monday to attach to this measure the bill which has heretofore passed the Senate, providing for two additional district judges for the southern district of New York, which bill has been recommended and urged by the Judicial Council three times and has passed the Senate. There are eight judges in the territory involved, and last year each judge tried or disposed of 655 cases, which, I submit, is a large amount of work. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I would not ask for the consideration of the amendment except for the fact that on the 20th of last August the Senate passed a bill which I am proposing to add as an amendment.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill; but if the Senator desires to attach to it the amendment to which he refers, I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 12B OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 1794, being Senate Joint Resolution 230. I am obliged to leave the Senate Chamber. I have been waiting all day in the hope the joint resolution would be reached. It merely proposes to amend the provision of paragraph (4) of subsection (n) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended.

The law at present provides that the rights given shall expire on July 1, 1936; and the committee has reported this joint resolution extending the time to 1938. After quite a full hearing, the joint resolution was unanimously reported by the committee, and it is desired to have action on it now, because the time will soon run out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not like to object to the request, but I think we should either proceed with the calendar or conclude the session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I may say to the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from Florida has been present in the Senate Chamber all day, and is anxious to have this measure considered, if it is to be considered under the present order. With that in mind, I consented to his making the request. However, following action on the request of the Senator from Florida, I shall make a request for unanimous consent and then move a recess.

Mr. McNARY. In view of that statement, I have no reason to interpose an objection to the request of the Senator from Florida.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 230) amending paragraph (4) of subsection (n) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That paragraph (4) of subsection (n) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by striking out "July 1, 1936" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1938."

ORDER FOR RECESS AND CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its labors today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow, and that upon the convening of the Senate tomorrow it proceed to the conclusion of the order now in progress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably Executive A, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, a convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States for the protection of migratory birds and game mammals, signed at Mexico City, February 7, 1936, and submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 1) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for promotion in the Foreign Service.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Thomas Parran, of New York, to be Surgeon General of the Public Health Service for a term of 4 years, vice Hugh S. Cumming, term expired.

Mr. LONERGAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Richard D. O'Connell, of Connecticut, to be State director, National Emergency Council, for Connecticut.

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Lamar Hardy, of New York, to be United States attorney, southern district of New York.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTER IN ARKANSAS

Mr. McKELLAR. By direction of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I also report favorably the nomination of Harris H. Parr to be postmaster at Eudora, Ark. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to this nomination, as I think he desires to make a request concerning it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harris H. Parr to be postmaster at Eudora, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Harris H. Parr to be postmaster at Eudora, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

SALARIES AND POSITIONS OF CERTAIN SENATE EMPLOYEES

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have just received a request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] having relationship to three resolutions recently adopted by the Senate directing the Appropriations Committee to take certain action. I refer to Senate Resolutions 249, 252, and 253. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the resolutions were agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes by which the resolutions were agreed to are reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be considered en bloc, as they are of the same general character. If consent is given, I will then move an identical amendment to each resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the resolutions en bloc?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions en bloc.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the word "directed" be stricken out of each of the resolutions and that the word "authorized" be inserted in place thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to each of the resolutions.

The amendment to each of the resolutions was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to each of the resolutions as amended.

The resolutions as amended were agreed to, as follows:

Senate Resolution 249, submitted by Mr. McNARY on the calendar day of March 12:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby authorized to increase the number of clerks at $1,800 under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper by one.

Senate Resolution 252, submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the calendar day of March 12:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby authorized to make the following changes in salaries and positions under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate, to wit:

Assistant financial clerk: Strike out "assistant financial clerk, $4,200" and insert "assistant financial clerk, $4,500."

Executive and assistant Journal clerks: Strike out "executive clerk and assistant Journal clerk, at $3,180 each" and insert "executive clerk, $3,180; assistant Journal clerk, $3,360."

Library and stationery assistant: Strike out "assistant librarian, and assistant keeper of stationery, at $2,400 each."

Clerks: Insert "one at $3,180"; strike out "two at $2,640 each" and insert "one at $2,640"; strike out "one at $2,400" and insert "five at $2,400 each"; strike out "four at $2,040 each" and insert "two at $2,040 each"; strike out "two at $1,740 each" and insert "four at $1,740 each"; insert "two at $1,860 each"; strike out "two assistants in the library at $1,740 each."

Laborers: Strike out "one in Secretary's office, $1,680" and insert "two in Secretary's office at $1,680 each."

Document room: Strike out "first assistant, $3,360" and insert "first assistant, $2,640"; strike out "second assistant, $2,400" and insert "second assistant, $2,040"; strike out "four assistants, at $1,860 each" and insert "three assistants, at $2,040 each."

Senate Resolution 253, submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the calendar day of March 12:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby authorized to make the following changes in salaries and positions under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, to wit:

Deputy sergeant at arms and storekeeper: Strike out "$4,440" and insert "$5,400."

Clerks: Strike out "one at $2,640" and insert "one at $3,180"; strike out "one at $2,100" and insert "two at $2,100 each"; strike out "three at $1,800 each" and insert "four at $1,800 each."

Janitor: Strike out "$2,040" and insert "$2,700."

Laborers: Strike out "three at $1,320 each" and insert "two at $1,320 each."

Skilled laborers: Strike out "five at $1,680 each" and insert "six at $1,680 each."

Messengers: Strike out "one at card door, $2,400, and $240 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent" and insert "one at card door, $2,400 and $600 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent."

Folding room: Strike out "assistant, $2,160" and insert "assistant, $2,400."

Telephone operators: Strike out "13 at $1,560 each" and insert "14 at $1,560 each."

Capitol police: Strike out "captain, $2,460" and insert "captain, $3,000."

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would like to suggest to Senators that resolutions of the character of those just acted upon be referred to the Committee on Appropriations before action is requested in the Senate.

I now move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, March 27, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 26, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we call upon the name of the Lord, which is worthy to be praised. He is our rock, our fortress, our deliverer, our strength, and our God, in whom we trust. O pitying, waiting Infinite One, how wonderful are Thy patience and long suffering. In these hours when we are gathered together, united by common hopes, purposes, and common necessities, we pray for the blessing that comes from the soul of the Creator of heaven and earth. Keep us from the fruits of the lawless mind, misplaced affection, and unchastened desire. Inspire in us that which is true, pure, and courageous. May they direct us in our demeanor. Merciful Father, vouchsafe Thy presence to those who carry grief and are acquainted with sorrow. Let the lines of Thy light be traced shining through the shadows. As they grow richer and ripen in their spiritual natures, may they tend more and more toward that beautiful experience—the peace that passeth all understanding. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VICTOR A. BARRON

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I call up a privileged report on House Resolution 453, reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment the following information, namely:

First. All facts pertaining to the death of one Victor A. Barron, an American citizen, who met his death while in the custody of the police at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on or about March 5, 1936.

Second. What was done by Hon. Hugh S. Gibson, American Ambassador to Brazil, to protect the American citizen, Victor A. Barron.

Third. Did Hon. Hugh S. Gibson, American Ambassador to Brazil, aid and abet in the arrest or questioning of Victor A. Barron.

Fourth. Did Hon. Hugh S. Gibson, American Ambassador to Brazil, or his agents, question said Victor A. Barron while said Victor A. Barron was in the custody of the Brazilian police for the purpose of obtaining information relating to Victor A. Barron's political activities.

Fifth. Any and all information with respect to the conduct of Hon. Hugh S. Gibson, American Ambassador to Brazil, and his agents, in connection with the arrest and death of Victor A. Barron.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report on the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 453):

"The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 453) directing the Secretary of State to transmit to the House of Representatives information concerning Victor A. Barron, American citizen, who met his death while in the custody of Brazilian police, having considered the same, submit the following report thereon, with the recommendation that it do not pass:

"The action of the committee is based upon the following letter to the chairman of the committee from the Secretary of State:

"The letter is as follows:

"MARCH 25, 1936.

"The Honorable SAM D. McREYNOLDS,

"Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs.

"House of Representatives.

"MY DEAR MR. McREYNOLDS: I have received a letter dated March 19, 1936, from Mr. I. R. Barnes, clerk of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, enclosing a copy of House Resolution No. 453, directing me to transmit information concerning the death of Victor A. Barron, an American citizen who died at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on March 5, 1936. I am pleased to submit the following information for consideration by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The numbered paragraphs of this letter give the information requested in the numbered paragraphs of the resolution.

"1. The Embassy at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, reported to the Department on March 5, 1936, that Mr. Barron had stated on March 4 that he was willing to indicate the street where Prestes and his companions left his car provided he was guaranteed that he could return to the United States, and that the police had agreed and intended to put him on a steamer sailing for New York on March 5. The Embassy's report indicates that Mr. Barron was taken on March 4 from the prison to police headquarters and pointed out on the city map the exact spot where Prestes and his companion left his car. He was then allowed, in the company of a detective, to go to a barber shop in town and to dine at a restaurant. On his return to police headquarters he was told in the presence of a representative of our Embassy that all arrangements were being made for his embarkation on the following day and that instead of returning to prison he would be given a special room at headquarters. Upon his return to police headquarters, Mr. Barron appears to have been greatly perturbed mentally, and it was only with great difficulty that he could be persuaded to go to a room which the police had arranged for him on the second floor overlooking a patio. At 8 o'clock the following morning he succeeded in evading the guard and committed suicide by plunging into the paved area of the patio two stories below. The Embassy stated in this connection that he had made a previous attempt to commit suicide.

"2. As soon as the Embassy became aware of the arrest of Mr. Barron, Mr. Gibson interested himself in the case with a view to effecting Mr. Barron's release and departure for the United States, and had obtained assurances from the police that upon completion of their investigation they would permit the Embassy to send Mr. Barron to the United States. Moreover, upon learning of Mr. Barron's arrest, the Embassy did everything it could to see that he would not be subjected to third-degree methods and, so far as the Department is informed, its efforts met with success. In view of the fact that he was in an advanced state of tuberculosis, the Embassy sought and obtained assurances that Mr. Barron would be afforded good medical care, and Mr. Gibson reports that the police acquiesced in all suggestions made by the Embassy with regard to Mr. Barron's treatment and care.

"3. The Ambassador did not aid and abet in the arrest or questioning by the police of Mr. Barron. The Embassy's reports indicate that the Ambassador had no advance information of the intention of the police to arrest Mr. Barron.

"4. The Ambassador requested information of Mr. Barron for the purpose of establishing his identity and citizenship in order that, if an American citizen, appropriate assistance might be rendered him, the nature of which would necessarily depend upon the circumstances. It should be recalled in this connection that Mr. Barron was arrested on account of his association with persons participating in an uprising against a foreign government. Upon finding that Mr. Barron was an American citizen, the Ambassador rendered the assistance set forth under point 2 above.

"5. The action taken by the Ambassador in connection with the arrest of Mr. Barron was the same as would be taken in connection with any American citizen arrested in a foreign country in similar circumstances. He did everything he appropriately could to obtain good medical care, release from imprisonment, and return to his home of this American citizen arrested on account of his association with persons participating in an uprising against a foreign government.

"Sincerely yours,

"CORDELL HULL."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, the motion by which the resolution was laid upon the table was laid on the table.

STREAM POLLUTION

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, including therein a radio address made by myself on last Friday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on March 20, 1936:

According to the poet, thoughts of love dominate the mind of young men during the balmy days of spring; but it is a matter of record that thoughts of fishing also occupy a prominent place during this season of the year, in the minds of quite a large proportion of our population, regardless of age or sex. After a winter of more or less forced confinement we naturally desire an opportunity to commune with Nature—man's greatest friend, teacher, and physician, the most generous of all philanthropists, in herself an infinite power, and God's agent of liaison with the human race. Each year over 7,000,000 of our citizens purchase fishing licenses. Add to this number those fishermen who, by reason of age or locality, do not require licenses, and it is safe to say that nearly 10,000,000 of our citizens are devotees of the art of Izaak Walton. This is quite a large percent of our population, and their desires should not be ignored.

Our land was originally abundantly blessed with streams, rivers, and lakes of pure and sparkling water, which were intended to be used by man in conformity with the spirit of the Golden Rule. I ask, in all candor, have we not sadly misused this element so essential to our health and happiness? In the industrial development necessary to progress, we have neglected to provide for many of the wants of man, which are, in the ultimate, just as essential to human progress as are food and clothing. The results of this negligence are all too clearly reflected in the daily life of our Nation. The findings of criminologists testify to the fact that the opportunity to exercise the desire for outdoor recreation should not be denied. It has long been a matter of record that none of our vicious criminals have ever been devotees of hunting or fishing. With this evidence before us we are forced to conclude that man gains some impelling influence for good from communion with Nature. It may be that he acquires a self-reliance which causes him to scorn a parasitic existence. It may be that he absorbs from natural surroundings a tolerance for others which makes him a better citizen. It may be that his will power is strengthened by the fresh air and exercise. Whatever may be the cause, the effect is, without a doubt, beneficial.

Few, indeed, are those among us of mature age who cannot turn back to the days of their youth and recall enjoyable days spent along or in the waters. Where was there ever a more democratic institution than the old swimming hole? Alas, the shaded pool beneath the willows no longer rings with the hilarity of youthful sport! The once clear water is contaminated by the wastes from concentrated population. Those waters are not only a menace to the health of the small boy who swims in them, but they also threaten the health of those who live nearby. The limpid waters of the creek, where once enchanted lovers canoed blissfully upon a summer's afternoon, are now of stygian hue from the tanneries above town, their foul stench replacing the fragrance of the wild flowers of other and better days.

The pool around the bend, where once the dim outlines of gray rocks could be seen through the translucent green water, is now yellow with the precipitation of the sulphuric acid from a coal mine. The rocks are no longer dim, but stand out brown and distinct through the lifeless water. The black bass, that wonderful game fish of this continent, no longer survives in his natural habitat. The sunfish, suckers, and even the bullhead are but memories. No aquatic life can survive. The acid in the water would consume the live steel of a fishing hook, were any fisherman foolish enough to cast one in it. There are waters so foul, so polluted, so poisonous, that the very ice of midwinter is soft and cheesy. No more can they ring with the strokes of the skaters or the shout of "Shinny on your own side!" Too many of our lakes and rivers have become but so many blots and streaks of disgrace upon the map of our Nation.

Surely all this disgraceful contamination is unnecessary, and should be prevented and corrected. We must have industry, of course; but shall we allow civilization to destroy itself? An individual is not allowed to deposit his wastes upon the yard of a neighbor. Why, then, should a collection of individuals be allowed to deposit their wastes upon the property of neighbors? Running water is common property the same as the atmosphere. It may be impounded and within reason diverted to private use. But certainly it is beyond the law of common decency to contaminate it so as to destroy its value to the public.

Navigable streams are under the control of the Federal Government, although the real estate bordering them enjoys riparian rights. The fishes in the streams are game, and as such are State property, subject to the protection of the State. Collectively they are the property of the citizens of the State, and the citizens may demand their protection. Navigable waters being under the control of the Nation, the citizens have the right to demand that they be protected from pollution. Since navigable streams are susceptible of contamination from sources and tributaries, the contamination of any of the waters flowing into navigable streams is a concern of the Federal Government. Few of our navigable streams are confined to any one State. The Mississippi, our largest, is fed by the waters of 31 States. Most certainly the preservation of its purity is a national question of major importance.

Into the waters of the rivers in the Mississippi Valley each year over 3,000,000 tons of sulphuric acid flows from the abandoned coal mines of the Appalachian coal fields. Year by year this acid has been increasing and its deleterious effects reaching further and further. The damage caused to stock, waterworks, boilers, plumbing, industrial equipment, and equipment on Government locks and dams is estimated at $10,000,000 per year. This takes no account of the poor character of the drinking water resulting to the cities which obtain their water from such sources. The economic factor alone is enough to waken public interest in this matter. I am glad to say that under F. E. R. A., C. W. A., and W. P. A. a very valuable program has been carried on in sealing these abandoned mines. This is an encouraging move in the right direction and should pave the way for more prevention of stream pollution. The completion of this program will eliminate about 70 percent of this acid coming from this region. There will remain, however, 30 percent from unsealed mines and all of the water from mines in operation. Unless this pollution is stopped, the money already expended will be of little avail.

It is said by those who have made an extended study of the matter that the prevention of pollution is by no means a difficult matter. As far as the acid from mines and factories is concerned, it can be neutralized. As for such wastes as sawdust and refuse from tanneries, filtering can be resorted to. Pollution caused by sewage is the most menacing of all, as far as the public health is concerned. It can and must be taken care of by sewage-disposal plants, which if of the proper character are productive of valuable byproducts and self-supporting.

At the present time the matter of pollution is in the hands of the various States by virtue of the police power vested in them by the Constitution. Any casual observer can plainly see that correction will be a long time coming if some other system is not adopted. The State laws in most instances are more marked by the breach of the law than by its observance. Some years ago I was fishing along a stream in northern Pennsylvania. A game warden arrested two young men, both under 19 years of age, for fishing without a license. Less than a half mile down the stream, in plain sight, was a tannery pouring its poisonous waste into this same stream, killing all the fish for miles below. This tannery had been in operation for years and innumerable petitions signed by a majority of the residents of the vicinity had been sent to Harrisburg in protest to no avail. The law applied to the sportsman but the tannery was immune. State laws against pollution have generally proven to be inadequate. We must have Federal laws and laws with teeth in them.

We must have cooperation among the various associations interested in the purity of our waters. We must gather together those interested in the matter from the viewpoint of health, economics, morality, beauty, and recreation, and bind them together to accomplish their common aim. Certain States progressive in this respect have demonstrated practical methods for the prevention of the evil of pollution. With this legislation to guide us, as a precedent and example, pollution can and must be prevented throughout the Nation.

We must not continue to neglect the side of our national life which affords recreation to our population. The young and the middle aged turn to Nature for recreation and exercise—the old for solace, the weary for rest. The most wealthy man on earth is the contented one. It is the concern of the Nation to promote contentment, because contented citizens are national assets. Idleness is the father of disorder and crime. Subversive movements originate in idle minds. No man pursuing the conquest for contentment in fishing, hunting, bathing, boating, or skating can be termed as idle. Thomas Jefferson did not write the words "pursuit of happiness" into the Declaration of Independence merely to fill up space. They had a definite meaning. They are the verdict of the philosophers of the ages. Let us unite upon a program which will insure that they do not prove to be an empty promise.

We strive to give our children a better education than we received. We wish them to labor under better surroundings than we have labored under. We wish to hand down to them in every way more advantageous material surroundings than we ourselves knew at their age. Let us determine to hand down to them Nature's great playground in the very best possible condition, consistent with our industrial development, to the end that they may grow up strong physically and morally and appreciative of the handiwork of Him who made heaven and earth. Let us not allow the masterpiece of the Greatest Architect to become befouled, besmirched, polluted, and contaminated by the wastes of those who have no love for their neighbor.

FLOOD CONTROL BY WATER CONSERVATION

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There is no objection.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, at this time when the Nation is contemplating the appalling human and property losses occasioned by the present floods, I wish to call the attention of Congress to H. R. 5533, a bill which I introduced during the last session of Congress. This bill was reported favorably by the subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation and is now pending before that committee. This bill provides for a practical solution of our ever-recurring flood problems. It at the same time conserves and makes use of the waters for the people of this Nation. These waters are now wasted and permitted to run to the ocean, leaving destruction and misery in their wake.

The bill provides for the impounding of the unused and uncontrolled floodwaters coming from the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, near their source, in such a way as to prevent disastrous floods in the lower Mississippi Valley at a low cost and on a permanent basis. While furnishing flood protection so necessary during the occasional periods of unusually high water, the project outlined in the bill is one which will serve many other important purposes and pay rich dividends 365 days in the year.

The bill authorizes and provides for a series of surveys by which a contour line can be selected along the eastern foothills of the Rocky Mountains. It will extend from a point at or near the Canadian border to a southern terminus near the Mexican line, at an elevation above the semiarid belt, for a total distance of approximately 1,400 miles.

The plan is to build a series of comparatively inexpensive dams in the streams and rivers where this line crosses them. They will be connected by earth-built embankments so that they, with the dams, will form an unbroken wall behind which will be held one continuous reservoir from Canada to Mexico. This will place all the precipitation of this great watershed under the complete control of the Federal Government at the least expense and with the greatest effectiveness.

The land used for reservoirs will be inexpensive, largely untillable hill land. The mountain water will be held away from the Missouri and the Mississippi during the times when they are high and will be released to them when it will be useful for navigation.

But the byproducts of this flood-control program are so many and so great that they will bear a large part of the expense by daily utility. A few of these are: Irrigation, reclamation, electric power, prevention of soil erosion, diminution of the silt now carried to the navigable streams by floods, general improvement of the climate in the entire belt, and through all these the employment of men—millions of men—in noncompetitive work.

Irrigation: In the territory served by this great reservoir the average rainfall is about 12 inches annually. This is just about one-third the amount necessary for successful farming. It is in these lands—the most fertile in the world if they had sufficient water—that the destructive dust and sand storms originate, casting their blight over land which is otherwise fruitful. Competent engineers tell me that there will be enough water conserved by this project to irrigate 15,000,000 acres of land. Part of this water could be used to irrigate the proposed timber shelterbelt, enabling it to grow a much greater variety and more useful types of trees. Much of this irrigating water will sink into the ground and add to the now diminishing underground water flows, thus replenishing the supply of thousands of wells, springs, and lakes.

Reclamation: Reclamation and irrigation are in many cases synonymous. Without irrigation the reclamation of this now untillable land is, of course, impossible. Here, however, we must use reclamation in a much broader sense. It means not only the reclamation of farming land, and there is much need of that, but the reclamation of towns and cities, of business and industry, of languishing utilities and unused transportation facilities.

Electric power: More and more the farmer as well as the city dweller, is relying on electric power. Anything that reduces its cost and increases its availability contributes substantially to better living. This water so stored will provide opportunities for the creation of cheap electric power, while the reclamation feature will provide a market for that power without infringing upon the supply now available within the territory.

Soil erosion: Such a vast amount of water distributed and used over so great a territory, with its resulting tree and vegetable growth, will naturally have a most beneficial effect in preventing soil erosion. Chester C. Davis, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, says, in an article in February's American Magazine:

Fifty million acres once cultivated in the United States no longer produce crops. * * *

That land lies idle. In large parts it is unprotected by vegetation to hold the soil. * * * Nature has written her protest on our dusty walls, on the desks in Washington, and in the food bills of consumers throughout the land. * * *

More than 3,000,000 tons of soil are washed and blown from our fields every year.

Soil erosion is a matter of tremendous importance to this and to all future generations.

Silt: Silt accumulation is one of the most serious problems with which the War Department engineers have to deal in maintaining the navigability of streams. The impounding of this water will greatly diminish the amount of silt which is ordinarily washed down from the mountain sides at flood times and which must inevitably find its way into the beds of our navigable streams.

Climate: It is a generally recognized fact that increased vegetation and density of trees stimulates the rainfall and has a general beneficial effect upon climatic conditions. This, of course, would be one of the byproducts of this project which would bring its tangible and intangible blessings.

Employment: For 6 long years industry, business, and the Government have been attempting to solve our problem of unemployment, and still there are 11,000,000 men for whom there is no work. Competent experts, who have spent practically their whole lives in the study of conditions of this section, estimate that the development contemplated by the mid-continent reclamation bill will provide direct and indirect employment for 5,000,000 men. This is not relief employment but will be at prevailing wages and will not be in competition with private industry but under a combination of conditions which will insure a return to the Government of every dollar advanced for these purposes.

I realize that the claims which I am advancing for this project seem almost incredible. Yet engineers of national reputation, bankers whose names are known around the world, hard-headed businessmen and some of our Nation's leading statesmen have examined the provisions of this bill. They are unanimous in saying that its enactment, when properly amended, will make provision for these developments and in so doing will make a practical, businesslike demonstration of what this system will accomplish in the prevention of floods. This will point the way for its use in many other sections of the country and, I think, will become the economical and sensible solution of all our flood-control problems.

Friends of this measure, men who are familiar with conditions in all sections of the country, say that the entire plan could be placed in operation on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains from Canada to Mexico. A preliminary survey indicates that a similar system could be located on a contour line, beginning below the mouth of the Ohio River and west of the Mississippi, and thence through parts of Missouri, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas to the Rio Grande River.

Another system could be placed around the foothills of the Allegheny Mountains under most favorable circumstances, not only for the prevention of floods but in making the floodwater usable for many purposes.

Another possible location would be on the headwaters of the Hudson River and its tributaries. The same system could be used in many sections of the Southern States; the benefits in each case would correspond to those contemplated by the midcontinent development as planned by its sponsors, the Mid-Continent Reclamation Association of Chicago.

Let me say again that as we are now reading daily of the havoc created by the floods, which this year have been so violent, we have here an opportunity of beginning the conquest of this gigantic problem.

All any reasonable man has to do is recognize the fact that our land surface rises from sea level to the mountain tops, and that under this condition similar systems for the control of flood waters could be installed wherever desired, and at a reasonable cost as compared to the loss occasioned by floods. Each project of this type can be financed under conditions that will make it self-liquidating; all that is required is to make a start, and in so doing prove the feasibility of the plan, show what it will cost, and what its benefits will be. The net result will be fewer and less disastrous floods and a richer Nation, all without endangering the public credit.

When this bill becomes a law there will arise a midland empire on the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains. Railroads will be running north and south, as well as east and west. The youth of this Nation will be given an opportunity. They will have an opportunity to build homes and enter industrial fields. Millions will be taken from the dole system. It will give a new frontier to our national aims. It will utilize and save the waters of this Nation where they are needed and add millions and billions to our national wealth. It will harness the rivers and streams at their source and use them for the good of mankind, rather than to allow them to destroy millions of dollars worth of property and many lives each year.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the special order, which is the address of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON], I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 465.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 465

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11689, a bill to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of the bill to extend the life of title I of the National Housing Act being administered by the National Housing Administration. The rule provides 2 hours' general debate and is an open rule.

The bill reported is the House bill. The Senate has passed a bill differing in some respects from the House bill. I mention the matter at this time because I have always been very much interested in the bill. One principal difference is that the Senate bill extends the life of title I until April 1 of next year, whereas the House bill extends it only to December 31 of this year.

Another matter in which I am very much interested and have been is this: You will recall that when the bill was under consideration before some of us made a very determined effort to have included a provision permitting loans up to $50,000 for the alteration and repair of tenements and apartments in cities. Out of all the billions of dollars appropriated for relief very little has come to the tenement dwellers in the cities, who suffer hardships equal to those suffered by persons in the smaller communities.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. As I stated yesterday, if the gentleman will present an amendment increasing the amount for such purpose from $25,000 to $50,000, I personally will make no objection to it whatever.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope the gentleman's committee will take the same attitude.

Take my own district, which is typical of a number of districts throughout the country. There never has been a loan made there by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. This is not the fault of the Corporation. The fact is that the houses there are old-fashioned brownstone houses and they are worth, because of the value of the land, sufficiently above the limitation in the act so that no loan could be made. Practically all Members have had projects in their respective districts, but none of us Members who represent city districts have had one single solitary project in our districts. We have no C. C. C. camps in our districts. Practically none of our boys go to the C. C. C. camps. We have been carrying the burden of cost and have received practically nothing out of the billions of dollars which have been appropriated and which we so earnestly supported.

Mr. Speaker, this provision was put in the bill for the purpose of helping living conditions in the cities. Rarely is $50,000 necessary; but this amount of money should be available to be lent for the alteration and the modernization of tenements and apartments. The acting chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee has said that while the committee amended the $50,000 to read $25,000 he personally has no objection to the original amount of $50,000 standing, as indicated in the Senate bill. I understand a number of Members on the committee are willing to permit the $50,000 to remain in the bill. I hope when that issue is raised, as it was raised last session, the committee will support the bill as it is. If the Committee decides to extend the life of the Housing Administration I hope they will take into consideration how long it shall be extended, and how worth while they will make it and permit these alterations and repairs up to the amount of $50,000.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 52]

Adair	Dietrich	Lesinski	Romjue
Allen	Doutrich	Lord	Rudd
Amille	Driscoll	Luckey	Sadowski
Andrews, N. Y.	Driver	Lundeen	Sanders, La.
Berlin	Dunn, Miss.	McClellan	Sandlin
Bland	Ferguson	McLeod	Scrugham
Brennan	Fish	McReynolds	Sirovich
Buckbee	Fulmer	McSwain	Steagall
Buckley, N. Y.	Halleck	Maas	Sweeney
Bulwinkle	Hancock, N. Y.	Maloney	Terry
Casey	Harter	Nichols	Thomas
Clalborne	Hess	Oliver	Underwood
Clark, Idaho	Hobbs	Perkins	Wadsworth
Clark, N. C.	Hoeppel	Pettengill	Wilson, La.
Connery	Imhoff	Polk	Wolcott
Cooper, Ohio	Johnson, W. Va.	Rabaut	Wood
Culkin	Kee	Ransley	Zioncheck
Daly	Keller	Reed, Ill.
Dear	Kocialkowski	Robison, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty-six Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this rule and in favor of the general purpose of the bill which is to extend the time of title I of the Housing Act, but I should like to make some observations in regard to certain provisions of the existing law. I had intended to make them later in the debate, but inasmuch as there has been little demand for time on this side to discuss the rule, I will make them now.

Let me say that I had nothing to do with making the point of no quorum. What I have to say is important, but it is not important enough to justify a point of no quorum.

It is interesting to review in retrospect some of the legislation which was passed during the hysteria which prevailed throughout the country during the first few years of this administration. Now that the hysteria has subsided somewhat it would be becoming for Congress to correct some of the more violent things which it did in the height of that hysteria.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation in one respect is one of the most amazing, if not the most amazing, pieces of legislation of them all. I refer particularly to the provisions in this Housing Act authorizing the Administrator of the act to appoint the employees, as many of them as he sees fit, without reference to the civil-service law, and to fix their compensation or to pay them whatever he sees fit, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. He was also given a blank check upon the Treasury of the United States, to go as far as he liked in the disbursement of funds. There was no check whatever put upon his discretion in any of these respects. It was brought out in the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency and before the Rules Committee that the expenses of administering the act up to March 31 of this year would be something like $20,000,000. The act was not passed until June 1934. That is what it will cost directly. What it has cost the Government indirectly no one can tell, because other relief agencies of the Government have been called upon to bear a great deal of the expense.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. Is it not true that the number of men employed as a result of the activities of this particular agency was of such a character as to wipe out that charge altogether, because if these men had been on relief they would not have cost $20,000,000, but probably $250,000,000.

Mr. MAPES. I do not think anything could wipe out the charge altogether, but that may have been a partial justification for what was done.

Mr. Speaker, I read in the paper last Sunday, as perhaps all the Members did, that the Roosevelt Administration has added approximately 235,000 persons to the full-time pay roll of the Federal Government and further that only 1 in every 107 of these 235,000 was brought in under the civil service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Does the gentleman know that there are 8,500 more positions under civil service today than there were when the Roosevelt administration went into office?

Mr. MAPES. Well, multiply that by 107, because this article says there has been only 1 in every 107 put on under civil service, and the result will show how greatly the forces have been increased in the last 2½ years.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, they have been increased, but the gentleman was leaving a wrong impression.

Of course, most of the emergency agencies have not been put under civil service, although quite a number of new agencies have been put under civil service. It would have been a physical impossibility, as the gentleman knows, to have held examinations and set up these agencies in time for them to become effective, under the civil-service laws.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I do not concede any such thing. That is the usual apology of those opposed to the civil service.

Mr. Speaker, I said this was one of the most amazing, if not the most amazing, pieces of legislation that had been passed so far as this particular feature is concerned.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to my chairman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Following what the gentleman has said, if we create a new bureau, whether it is an emergency or otherwise, how long does the gentleman think it would take to get it started if it had to start out with civil-service employees?

Mr. MAPES. There are thousands of people on the eligible list in the office of the Civil Service Commission, who are seeking positions all the time, and it would not take any longer, if as long, to start it with civil-service eligibles as it does without them, and once the organization was completed under the civil service, it would be much more efficient and much more competent to carry on than it is when set up under the patronage system that has been in vogue during the last few years.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand there are not enough different lists of different classes of employees to set up any organization.

Mr. MAPES. I am afraid that the gentleman from New York has been so interested in partisan patronage that he has not informed himself as to the number of people on the eligible list in the office of the Civil Service Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will wager the gentleman I have got fewer jobs than he has under this administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAPES. I dare say it has not been any fault of the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he interprets the remarks of the gentleman from New York to mean that in his view a civil-service set-up in this country is passé and that the Civil Service Commission ought to be abolished?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman says it will not work.

Mr. MAPES. For all practical purposes it has been abolished during the last 2 or 3 years.

Mr. EATON. It would not work under a New Deal administration.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not intend to say any such thing. I have been for civil service. You can set up a bureau, and after it gets going you can put it under civil service and hold your examinations, but you cannot hold them before if you ever want to get the work started.

Mr. EATON. Why set up so many bureaus?

Mr. MAPES. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, under the gentleman's theory, as soon as all the places are filled with good partisan Democrats, then they should be blanketed into office under the civil service.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? We would be following Republican example if we did that.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an opportunity to make a consecutive statement.

All that is needed to substantiate what I have said is to read a few sentences from the Housing Act. I read from the act:

The President is authorized to create a Federal Housing Administration, all of the powers of which shall be exercised by a Federal Housing Administrator.

The President's appointment of the Administrator is to be confirmed by the Senate, and his salary is limited to $10,000 per year, but there is no limitation put upon the Administrator under the act.

Mr. Speaker, I read further:

In order to carry out the provisions of this title—

Which is title I—and titles II and III, the Administrator may establish such agencies, accept and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services—

Then, after providing for utilizing the services of Federal and State employees, it continues—and appoint such officers and employees as he may find necessary and may prescribe their authority, duties, responsibilities, and tenure.

The gentleman from New York states he has not been able to get many of his constituents on the pay roll. I will say to the gentleman that it is perfectly possible for the Administrator of this law to put as many of the gentleman's constituents on his pay roll as he wants to, without any limitation whatever, and give them any compensation that he desires to pay them.

This is a pretty broad statement, but listen to this language:

The Administrator may fix their compensation without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment or compensation of officers or employees of the United States.

And, again:

The Administrator may delegate any of the functions and powers conferred upon him under this title—

That is title I—and titles II and III to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint, and may make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books and books of reference and for paper, printing, and binding) as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this title and titles II and III, without regard to any other provisions of law governing the expenditure of public funds.

Here is another provision which should appeal particularly to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Speaker:

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title and titles 2 and 3, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make available to the Administrator such funds as he may deem necessary, and the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time under existing law, is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to provide such funds.

The Administrator does not have to come to the Appropriations Committee, nor to Congress, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can exercise no discretion, but it is directed under this law to turn over to the Administrator such funds as the Administrator may deem necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I have prepared some amendments which I shall offer during the consideration of the bill to correct some of these things to which I have called attention.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does not the gentleman understand that the provisions of this title will cease on December 31 of this year?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman would not object to having it corrected for the few months still remaining?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not think it is very important.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REILLY. I want to suggest that if the gentleman will go back and look over the record of the former administration he will find that the Democratic Party in this matter followed your own leadership.

Mr. MAPES. That is a poor excuse, even if true; and I doubt whether the Republican Party or any other party before this administration ever went to the length that it has gone.

Mr. REILLY. It may be a question of degree.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. RICH. When this administration came into power there were 61 regular departments of the Government. On March 3, 1936, we have established 41 new organizations.

Now, the Democratic Party made the statement in its platform that it was going to reduce the Government bureaus or departments—consolidate them. Instead of that you have increased them 70 percent in 3 years. It seems to me it is time to discontinue a lot of these organizations set up by the Democratic Party in the last 3 years. Their promises to the American people in 1932 were not fulfilled.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, of course this is the open season, elections are coming, and we will seize upon every available opportunity to put something in the RECORD. Yesterday, after a tale of terrible distress which reached the very heart strings, a distinguished Member rose, and, under the cloak of speaking relative to the distress in this country, delivered one of the worst political tirades that I have heard in the many years of my service here. So, of course, everything that we are doing now which has been going on for the last 2 or 3 years has been criticized, but we want to reiterate it and get it again before the people and say, "See how we are going after these fellows, they have been spending the money right and left, and although you know that they took you out of the slough of despond, yet forget all that, and go after them for not keeping the number of departments down and keeping the organizations as they were, with the accompanying result that the country was in dire distress, desolation and poverty." However, I did not get up to speak about that. I want to speak about this bill. I think that our Committee on Banking and Currency has made a definite mistake in bringing in the bill they have because instead of liberalizing the conditions the way they should be, they have been tightening them up. Why tighten them up, when the end of the depression is approaching, when we are trying to get back on our feet and help everybody else do the same. To begin with, they curtail the time from April 1, 1937, to December 1, 1936. That is indictment no. 1. Indictment no. 2: They strike out the word "additions." Suppose a man wants to add a little bath room to his house, or he wants to add another part to the building to get comfort and recreation for his family, you strike that out. Indictment no. 3: It reduces the amount that can be loaned for commercial and other buildings of that type from $50,000 to $25,000, which is a direct slap at the great cities of the country. The great city of New York pays approximately 13 percent of all of the taxes collected by this Government, and yet we have received practically little or no money for commercial alterations in our city. A city alteration cannot be done with $25,000. Fifty thousand dollars is not enough, and in many cases they need $100,000 or $200,000 to accomplish what you set out to do.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yesterday morning's paper stated that the State of New York paid one-third of the entire taxes of the United States.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman is correct in regard to the State. I thank him.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that one-fifth of the loans under title I have been made through New York banks?

Mr. BOYLAN. Loans of $2,000 or less, in the rural sections of the city, but I am speaking of the great metropolitan section, where the tenements are.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is indictment no. 3. Indictment no. 4: Insurance is restricted to 10 percent. Instead of 20 percent, it is reduced to 10 percent. That is another tightening up, and it will make loans harder to get from the banks. Indictment no. 5: The total amount shall not in the aggregate exceed $100,000,000, a reduction from $200,000,000. I am rather surprised that our splendid Committee on Banking and Currency, for the members of which I have the highest respect and regard, should seek to curtail the benefits of this act, which we in the House, noted as the apostles of liberalization in extending benefits to citizens of our country, would naturally have sought to broaden and extend. Therefore, it is with a good deal of pain and sorrow and regret that I see that our committee is taking a stand opposite to that usually taken by the House.

Right here let me say that up to now we have done nothing toward providing cheap housing for the people of low income in the great cities. Even the loans we have made to limited-dividend corporations, carrying only about 4-percent return to the corporations, have not succeeded in bringing low-cost rentals to the people in the great cities. Even with all these advantages, even with the advantages of reduced taxation and certain exemptions, the best they can get is down to $12 and $14 per room per month; and people of low income, earning from $1,000 to $1,500 per year, cannot afford to pay these high prices. Before Congress adjourns something definite should be done to make adequate appropriation to subsidize local, State, or municipal corporations, so that with a Federal subsidy proper buildings can be erected that will insure a rent of from $5 to $7 per room per month for these underprivileged, underpaid, and low-income people of the great cities. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I find myself in somewhat of an unpleasant position this morning in that I am not able to go along with the majority members of our committee. I know it would be futile if I wanted to do so—and I do not—for me to attempt to stop the passage of this rule. I am merely trying to eliminate the defects in the bill and make it operate more effectively and less costly to the taxpayers. I have given long, thorough, and interested study to this legislation. I have been associated with home-financing legislation since its inception in 1932 with the passage of the Federal home-loan bank bill, and my attitude, therefore, toward encouraging home ownership is well known.

I have tried my valiant best to render a service to the House and to the people of America in working out sound programs for home financing. I appreciate that the future of our civilization will depend to a great degree on this type of legislation. I know it is in the home that patriotism is born. It is about the only material thing I have been able to save since the depression. I have always believed that the average man, without reflecting upon conditions which make it so that he must live in them, would not be willing to fight to save a boarding house. I also recognize—and I do not say it in a critical way—that the word has been handed down to pass this bill as it is now written. I recognize that the leadership of the House is powerfully interested in getting this bill through today.

I feel, however, that the study I have made of the legislation and the very close observation I have given to its "impractical" application enables me to help you in your desire to reach a wise conclusion about this bill. I am not anxious that you shall follow my judgment. It is a matter left entirely with you, but I believe that the present bill as written can and should be materially amended in the public interest. These changes will make it sounder, safer, and more effective. I believe the time is not far off when Members of this House and the American people will appreciate exactly what has been going on under title I of the Federal Housing Administration. When the dawn of some of the practices they now engage in breaks in your face you will understand that my efforts here today were timely and constructive. Let us go back in history a few years.

Those who were here in 1934 remember that the original philosophy underlying title I was this: The President sent a message to Congress asking that legislation be enacted which would place the credit of the Government behind private financing for home construction and repair. In other words, that message suggested that the Federal Government become cosigner with every individual who was eligible under the legislation. He set out two very desirable objectives. One was that through legislation of the kind suggested men would be put back to work. Therefore the main objective was to re-create employment. The second major objective was to create tangible, useful wealth in a form for which there is a great social and economic need. The banks had become timid. Other lending institutions were afraid.

Individuals dared not borrow. Something had to be done to break the jam. Those were days of emergency, and nearly everyone felt that any move designed to put the unemployed in the building trades back to work in substantial numbers was worthy of serious consideration. This was the means suggested, and, in my opinion, up to this date, with all of its faults it has accomplished something worth while toward that end. However, it has not been operated upon a sound and efficient basis. It has utterly and dismally failed to measure up to the claims which its officials make for it. Compare their reports of accomplishments with tangible results in your own districts. Analyze what they claim with what their own records show they have done. It has been carried on by an excess of ballyhoo of every form known to the soap-box artists. N. R. A. was a piker when pitted against this aggregation. More bombarding publicity has been invoked in propagating this work than that of any other agency in my knowledge. Quite recently they have even resorted to the selection of approximately 3,000 W. P. A. workers, who have been sent in the cities to ring doorbells and leave literature asking people to purchase certain appliances. I know we have to do everything we can to give worthy men positions. I recognize and appreciate the fact that the Government owes an obligation to provide a way to work for every honest, worthy, and willing worker. [Applause.] So much for their methods of getting business and making the public buy appliances on the easy terms they do not provide. Who is sponsoring this legislation today? It is a rather strange thing, however, if you will go back to 1934 and examine the hearings, to see the witnesses who appeared before us at that time suggesting the wisdom of this legislation. If you will take that list and compare it with the list who appeared in 1935 you will wonder about the true parentage of this agency which has been ballyhooed as doing so much to encourage employment and recreate wealth in America. Where are those who so solicitously awaited its birth as the forerunner of all that was great and good for the unemployed and the home owners?

In 1934 we had before us distinguished public officials—Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Dean, Miss Perkins, Mr. Fahey. In 1935 we had Mr. McDonald and Mr. Moffett, Mr. Ellenbogen, and several distinguished Members of the House. In 1936 we have Mr. McDonald back, and he is the only one who appeared before. Then comes Mr. Flanders, Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Girard, and Mr. Young, all of whom are splendid gentlemen, but what showing do they make. I strongly intimated when this legislation was originally before our committee and after Mr. Dean and Mr. Riefner had been heard that the real purpose and philosophy would not be put into practice. I knew then, as my questions proved, that title I would be used largely as a grand sales agency, not for the building trades but for a few selected industries engaged in the manufacture of household appliances and equipment. I have not been deceived, but I know some of you have. It is very easy for any man to come back to the House and say, "I told you so", but I am here to tell you that based upon the record—not what I may say about it—I mean their own reports—that the represented true purpose has not been carried out, but on the contrary it has been both distorted and perverted.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Is it not a fact that Congressman DUFFY of Ohio introduced the bill asking for an extension of title I and Congressman DINGELL, of Michigan, appeared before the committee in behalf of the bill?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I said just now that several other Members of the House appeared.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he said no one else exhibited enough interest in the bill to testify.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Of course, we all know where the pressure has come from for carrying on the operations without modifications. It is rather significant that no one has referred to a request from a prospective voluntary borrower. Now here is the record. What does the Administrator himself have to say about continuing to subsidize these lending institutions for this purpose to the tune of 20 percent of their total aggregate loans? In the first place, Mr. McDonald on the 13th day of February 1935, on page 76 of the hearings, stated that he did not personally expect to request an extension of the act; that was the way he felt about it at the moment. That is the record. Now let us examine his recent statement. In the hearings before the Senate recently he stated, in effect, that title I had spent its purpose. Here are his exact words:

If you terminated the activities of title I of the Federal Housing Act on April 1 of this year, I do not think it would cause any marked slowing up in the business activity of the country. We feel that title I has already largely accomplished its objectives.

He did modify that later on in his testimony by saying that whereas these institutions had been using crutches, he thought perhaps it might be necessary for the Government to at least extend to them a cane. No reference is made to the plight of the home owner needing assistance to keep his home in livable condition.

The institutions he was talking about are the banking institutions bulging with cash to lend because they have been doing about 72 percent of this 20-percent guaranteed business. What a gray train this program has been to some of them. It is little wonder that some of them have an affectionate regard for the officials of F. H. A. in charge of title I. Its almost a game of "heads I win, tails you lose" for Uncle Sam. He is the goat and we made him so.

Under the original act, in order to offer inducements to those institutions to make the loans, the Congress provided that each institution that was approved would be guaranteed up to 20 percent of the total loans which they made. Remember and bear in mind that it was not 20 percent on the individual loan, not 20 percent of their losses, but they were guaranteed 20 percent of the total loans made. Can you imagine it?

Now, let us see what that means. Let us take for an illustration the National City Bank of New York, which was instrumental in securing this legislation, through their Mr. Steffon, and which, by the way, has made about one-fifth of all loans guaranteed under title I.

In 1934, under title I, $40,000,000 in loans had been insured by the Government, through F. H. A., involving a liability of $8,000,000. This bank had made advances of credit of about $7,000,000 during the first 6 months of the act, which meant they could lose $1,400,000 yet not be out a dollar. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think the Federal Housing Administration is a very important agency of the Government, and I think it is aimed at the revival of the industry which means more to us now than perhaps any other affected by the depression. The building industry, in my judgment, is the key to complete recovery. An investigation of the products that enter into the building industry and industries associated therewith leads one to the belief that the building industry needs more encouragement than any other in the country.

I hope no difficulties will be encountered because of the belief on the part of some Member that this organization is being used to promote partisan activities and organizations. We must be fair; partisanship must not divide us when the agency is a helpful one. I ask you to look at the record and then you will agree with me when I say this agency was instituted under Republican auspices. The first director of the agency was himself a Republican. Through real-estate boards and banking organizations who received recommendations that led to the appointment of district directors, I was called in, not by the political organization of my county but by the real-estate board, which, in turn through its national organization, had been requested to give consideration to men who were worthy applicants to head this agency in that part of the country. The director in the city of Buffalo and for all of western New York, therefore, the man who organized the agency, was not selected by partisan methods but, like the National Director, was a Republican.

The statement was made a short time ago that we ought to call upon the Civil Service Commission to give us a list of eligibles so we might appoint them to these various agencies created during the emergency.

This, indeed, is a fine objective, but it is entirely impractical. Dealing with an emergency requires instant and immediate effort on the part of lawmaker and Executive. There was not a list available that would furnish to us emergency set-ups and the particular kind of skilled men required. We had never gone into this business of relief before; it had been a local activity; but when the counties and the States, both Republican and Democratic insofar as administration was concerned, put up the white flag and demanded that the Federal Government take over relief, the Government was in a new activity for the first time in its career. What did the President of the United States do at that time? Not only did he appoint a Republican in charge of the Housing Administration but he also appointed a Republican to have charge of the great relief agency now known as the W. P. A. The Public Works Administration was placed under another Republican. Everybody here knows that at least 12 or 15 of our former colleagues on the Republican side either now hold or have held jobs under this administration. The Government, of course, could furnish stenographers, typists, and ordinary clerks, but the Civil Service Commission had no available list of men possessing the technical knowledge required in the investigation of mortgages, loans, and so forth, which enter so largely into the work of this organization.

Through the facilities of the Federal Housing Administration at least $1,000,000,000 have been invested in refinancing and in home construction, repair, and modernization. The movement in durable goods resulting from the F. H. A. program has lent a substantial impetus to national recovery, and at the same time it has been vastly beneficial to American home owners.

This governmental agency is unquestionably a primary factor in our economic revival, as it encourages private capital by its insurance methods to make loans, and this encouragement promotes increased employment in the building trades. In order to insure mortgage loans it has set up an exceptionally precise method for land and building valuations, which, together with the guaranty on those loans, puts real-estate properties on a sounder economic basis and less vulnerable to the dangers from adverse economic cycles. The F. H. A. has made a splendid record and proved itself popular. It merits national commendation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my people are interested in the extension of the authority granted by this bill. It has proved to be a wholesome undertaking in the part of the country where I live. One of our important industries in my part of our State is the building business. The Federal Housing Administration has been a boon to a great many of our mechanics and tradesmen, and we in northern New Jersey are interested in having this bill passed. I do not think there is going to be very great opposition to it.

There is one salutary provision in the bill having to do with loans made to tenants under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of an insured loan. Under the original law a loan made to a monthly tenant could be insured. Cases arose where tenants under a monthly tenancy purchased such things as refrigerators and then moved without leaving any trace of their whereabouts. Tenants have made purchases under high-pressure salesmanship. In some cases the equivalent of a month's rent has been offered tenants in order to promote sales, some of which were made without a bona-fide down payment. I feel that in making provision for the sales of such articles as refrigerators the tenants getting the insured loans ought to meet the condition precedent that they have a lease expiring subsequent to the maturity of the loan.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this rule and I know it is going to be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed Senate bill 4212, a measure similar in part to this bill. Originally the language in the Senate bill was practically the same as in the House bill. However, the Senate has inserted new language. Senate bill 4212 has been passed by the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table. The title of the two bills is the same.

I think it is very advisable we substitute the Senate bill. In other words, I suggest that the House strike out everything after the enacting clause, putting in whatever language the House agrees to today for the language in the Senate bill. If we do this we will expedite the final passage of this bill. If we do not follow this procedure, when the House bill, H. R. 11689, goes back to the Senate the Senate will have to take up that particular bill. It must go to a Senate committee. That means delay. I believe this is a courtesy which we owe the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, the present law expires in 5 days. It is essential that this bill become a law by that time or the Housing Administration will have no legal right to carry on business. Surely the committee should see the wisdom of accepting this suggestion. Remember the President is not in this country, but on vacation in the West Indies, or somewhere in that vicinity, and it will be necessary to take the bill to him for his signature. Of course, it will be sent by seaplane. Both Houses have been adjourning Friday over the weekend. Therefore, it appears to me that we must dispose of this bill in both the House and Senate before adjournment tomorrow night if the bill is to reach the President and be signed before the present law expires. By passing the Senate bill at this time it will expedite the passage of the legislation. The Senate can either agree to the House amendment or ask for a conference. Of course, the House will grant an immediate conference, and the conferees can get together tomorrow and reach some agreement, and bring the bill back to both Houses before adjournment tomorrow night. It will be impossible to do this unless you substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In addition to that the bill has to be signed by the President before the 1st of April?

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is correct. Is it a question of pride of authorship? That is the only reason I can see for the committee not accepting this suggestion. I spoke to members of the committee, but could secure no assurance my suggestion would be followed out. I do not think pride of authorship should interfere in a matter as important as this is. I make the suggestion, therefore, that we substitute Senate bill S. 4212, and strike out all after the enacting clause in that bill and substitute the language in the House bill. The parliamentary situation will not permit me to do this, but I am sure the acting chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency can get those controlling the time to yield to him for that purpose if he will but make the request. It should be done before we go into the Committee of the Whole, as a motion will prevail now. After the bill has been considered in Committee it can only be done by unanimous consent, and some Member opposed to the bill might object. I appeal to the Committee in charge of the bill to take the action I request now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Hancock]. On the contrary, I say—and the figures will so show, if the annual report and the other statements furnished by the F. H. A. are examined—that this has been one of the most useful agencies of the Federal Government in connection with the promotion of employment. It has done so and is doing so at the present time without incurring the criticism of putting the Government into competition with private interests. It has accomplished its purposes by bringing out from hiding private capital.

As I understand it, our committee was practically unanimous in reporting the House bill, and I believe this applies to the Republican Members as well as the Democratic Members, although I may be in error. I think all of the Republican Members were not present. However, with the sole exception of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Hancock], the committee was, generally speaking, unanimous for the House bill. Some of us did advocate certain changes which appear in the Senate bill.

Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] that New York City has not received the particular kind of relief and help under the law which has been in effect during the past year that it should have received. Of course, I am not authorized to speak for New York City, but as a matter of fairness I think I should make that statement. I agree with him also that the $25,000 limitation under title I should be put back to $50,000.

Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to just two or three other things which I understand will be offered in the form of amendments to the House bill, probably by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown]. I entirely agree with the position which I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown] will take. One of these has to do with the proposition that title I of the House bill terminates on December 31, 1936, at a time when Congress is not in session. I think it should be extended to April 1, 1937, as provided in the Senate bill.

The second proposition is that there were a great many gentlemen, some Members of the House, and many men from private industry, who appeared before our committee and asked that title I should continue to include, as it does under the present law, financing of electric appliances, this to apply to insurance only. This has been cut as to the amount of insurance from 20 percent to 10 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I think this agency is still doing a useful work in promoting business. This provision as to electric appliances is in the Senate bill, but has been taken out of the House bill. It should be restored.

I cannot argue the merits of the bill. I am not physically able to do so. There is a lot to be said for the bill, and I do not believe there is any substantial opposition to the philosophy of the legislation. I do not believe there will be any really serious or substantial opposition to the amendments which will hereafter be offered either by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] or the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Brown]. I want to say that I am 100 percent for all of them. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Duffey].

Mr. Duffey of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, answering the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran], I inform the House that since the bill passed the Senate there have been some unusual conditions arising in this country, particularly by reason of floods. The House Committee on Banking and Currency has properly seen fit to include in the pending legislation a provision whereby new construction on unimproved real estate may be made in a sum not to exceed $2,000. If we substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, we will thereby deny this relief, which is very necessary. I submit therefore, Mr. Speaker, that we should pass the House bill as it has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, with an amendment as to the effective expiration date, to April 1, 1937.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Farley].

Mr. Farley. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the many things which have been said on the floor of this Chamber with regard to Government interference with private business. In order that the Members may realize what this Government has done to private business, I checked the following, and I find that on March 1, 1933, the low on the New York Stock Exchange of General Motors stock was 10½. The high was 10%. General Electric stock on the same day, low 11¼, high 12. Today General Motors is selling at 67½ and General Electric at 38¾.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11689) to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11689, with Mr. O'NEAL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we are not opposing this particular bill, but as we have 2 hours for discussion, certainly some general observations should be made with respect to the present situation. We read a few days ago that the President himself said that the Federal housing program is in such a mess that it is doubtful whether anything can be done about it very soon. That does not detract from this measure particularly, but certainly when he makes a statement like that we wonder whether we may not be to blame for such an utter lack of coordination. One thing that we should keep in mind is that one authority should be doing something to save the homes of our people, and the other proposition should be entirely different, namely, to encourage the building of small homes for the average American family able and eager to do so.

No one could have been more enthusiastic for this plan than I when it was passed. I have, however, criticized the ballyhoo methods adopted. I consulted with the officials of many banks and urged their cooperation. However, I learned that at the start, at least, most loans made were made for refrigerators and other appliances. The lumber dealers and others did not seem immediately to prosper as much as we had hoped and expected they would. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] portrayed these ballyhoo methods accurately to you.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FORD of California. Did not the lumber dealers come to the committee and urge that this be passed?

Mr. GIFFORD. Indeed they did, and they came to me and I sympathize with their hopefulness. They were a part of the volunteer committee the country was urged to form. They went around doing their best to get people interested in this proposition, and they are still hopeful and are interested. They have received some good, and I hope it will continue to stimulate their business.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman made the statement that the President has said that the Housing Administration is in a mess.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Did he point out the particulars in which it is messy, or did he say anything further about that?

Mr. GIFFORD. I simply read to the House what was in the newspapers as reported from a conference.

Mr. MAY. I think as a matter of fact he made that statement—

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, everybody knows that it is in a mess.

Mr. MAY. The House is entitled to know something about it.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am going to tell why it is in a mess. There are various activities trying to bring about building operations. There are too many working at cross-purposes. W. P. A. in New Mexico in one little community of 14 people, with only 4 school children, constructed 2 schoolhouses to the tune of $5,000 each. I get this from a Democratic newspaper, so I presume it must be correct. It stated that they have to allocate money in New Mexico, as well as in other States. They have two United States Senators. That is one way the P. W. A. is spending money. Another way in which it is spending money is in the matter of slum clearances, and if I had with me certain other Democratic newspaper clippings I could show how they criticize these slum-clearance propositions. I will, however, read to you here a report which shows how the Government is acting at cross-purposes in these matters:

The Federal Housing Administration is insuring real-estate mortgages whereby private building lending may be encouraged. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has loaned public money to almost a million private owners, and seems to represent a policy of supporting private real-estate values.

But there are two policies involved. One is to try to protect real-estate values; the other to use slum clearance for relief purposes, and then, by low rentals, ruin other real-estate values. They are spending many millions for these slum-clearance projects. This is really working at cross-purposes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I know what the gentleman from New York is thinking. I have read a lot about slum clearances. The tears would pour from my eyes if I attended some of those public meetings you have held in New York City, sponsored by your mayor, and I should probably be induced to agree with the gentleman; but before he asks a question about it I want to say that I do not complain where it is really properly done. And while the gentleman is on his feet I want to do a little Yankee trick and ask him a question.

Mr. BOYLAN. Go ahead. I will answer the question.

Mr. GIFFORD. Why, in the nearby city of Stamford, Conn., as I read, where there are no slums, did they receive an allocation of $800,000 for slum clearance?

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, I do not represent Stamford, Conn. That is represented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT], one of the best men in this House. I suppose he got the $800,000. I did not get it.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, the gentleman from New York has not answered my question.

Mr. BOYLAN. I will answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman said a great deal of money was spent for slum clearance. The gentleman is an intelligent man, well read, well versed, and an excellent Congressman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BOYLAN. He represents his district in a splendid manner. The gentleman knows, however, that in all these slum-clearing projects, so called, they have not been slum-clearing projects at all, because even with limited dividend corporations, when the houses were completed, it was necessary to rent them from $10 to $12 and $14 per room per month. So the gentleman knows that is not slum clearance, because in slum clearance the rents would be, at the extreme, from $5 to $7 per room per month. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is what I claim is the trouble. I had a picture of a slum-clearance operation in my State. They were good buildings. They looked like some of the new Harvard University dormitories. They cannot rent them to the same people who had them before, so these must have removed to a different section, perhaps no more desirable than the old one. Oh, the thing is to beautify the city at the expense of the Federal Government. Are we to keep on loaning money to wealthy communities like Stamford for this purpose? It is too true that many of my own communities, because the taking was good, have saved their own towns from going into indebtedness by accepting this Federal money. I am not now, or at any time, criticizing any individual who may have charge of any project. I am not much interested even in digging up corruption. As ranking member of the Committee on Expenditures, how often have I said that my criticisms are not aimed at people? You cannot entirely avoid political corruption in projects of this nature. There is plenty of it. I am having it in my own district. But I am not looking for somebody in particular to punish. I am rather criticizing these policies that we are following. We are indeed working at cross-purposes. Think of the waste of money which has been provided for resettlement. I wonder if we will approve and marvel at the Tugwell projects in and around Washington? How many such favored spots are there going to be?

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. You know the old story of the way the monkey killed the bees, one at a time. We were talking about slum clearance and now the gentleman has gone off to resettlement.

Mr. GIFFORD. I probably meant to lead the gentleman astray.

Mr. BOYLAN. Next the gentleman will be saying something about those celebrated oysters from Cape Cod.

Mr. GIFFORD. I thought the gentleman would arrive at something like that.

Mr. BOYLAN. I guess they were buying the refrigerators of which the gentleman spoke to put these celebrated Cape Cod oysters in. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Well, I should like to talk about these famous oysters that have been referred to.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Perhaps the gentleman will yield a little later after he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I cannot yield at this time. I was trying to tell you that I urged my banks to loan money under title I. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] is right in part of his argument. Highly trained salesmen who were temporarily out of a job were put to work by the E. R. A. They were good salesmen. Every week end when they reported they naturally wished to report that they had done some business. But their job was to induce people who were able to spend money and not too strongly to urge those who were not in a position to do so.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman has criticized the activities of the E. R. A. workers several times. Is it not a fact that the Government of the United States was kind enough to get E. R. A. workers to circulate a document extolling the beauties of Cape Cod and Cape Cod cottages? Does the gentleman not think he ought to give the Democrats a little credit for that?

Mr. GIFFORD. Just as I did yesterday. I gave them credit for these men urging us to spend money. I am one of those who went into debt when I had no business to do so, and I am now, like many others, suffering for thus going into debt as a result of a desire to go along. That is what I gave you credit for yesterday. That is your whole proposition. Do anything you possibly can to get the people to owe money.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. They spent their time advertising the gentleman's congressional district as a summer resort.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope they said something about it. But I know how this thing works. I have talked with these men. I have in mind men they sent out in my district. They were all eager to make a showing. One of the fellows said to me, "The other fellows could not make a certain sale. I sold him." They were high-pressure salesmen. I said in the first place that this was all right where people were able to do it. But you have gone so much further than that and the results are rather disappointing.

I was talking with the gentleman from Maryland the other day, and I feel sure he is willing for me to repeat the conversation, because I know he is one who does not believe in people going into debt. He fairly and truthfully said that the banks in his own particular district did not care to take this kind of loan; that they were high-pressure loans; that if a man really could afford it, the bank itself would be only too glad to lend the money. I have criticized so many other things that when I see something I am hopeful for I want to see it given a further chance, and I shall support this bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact the gentleman has kicked my shins—

Mr. GIFFORD. I paid the gentleman a high compliment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. May I ask the gentleman whether he will vote for the bill?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, certainly; I said so in the beginning.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am glad to have the gentleman's support.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am very glad to vote for some of these things, of which I am hopeful. My effort at the present time is to show at what cross-purposes the various agencies of the administration are working, in an endeavor to bring out these weaknesses. This is not necessarily opposition, is it? Certainly we should uncover the weaknesses in the hope of remedying them.

I desire to bring out one further thing. I do not think any of us felt, when we originally passed title I of the bill, that under it new homes could be built. We thought the $2,000 was to be spent for additions and improvements, but we find they have built $2,000 homes complete. They want this permission specifically incorporated in the bill, and under the flood conditions now prevailing I am one who would say that if we can go into these flood areas and make a character loan to a man who owns his land, and if he can build a complete house for $2,000, it is a splendid thing and under present conditions should be put in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have been in the real-estate business for many, many years. When I entered this business I could get a title searched for $3, but I should like to see you get a loan where you have to have a title searched that will cost you less than $50. You are fortunate, indeed, these days if you can. If it can be so arranged that this $2,000 can be lent as a character loan and save the attorneys' fees of $50, it will be a very wonderful thing at this particular moment; and I urge, when this matter comes up, that it be kept in the bill. As a matter of fact, I think it was in the bill, but that the Federal Housing Administration proposed that it be taken out.

Inasmuch as I see the chairman of the committee looking at me rather sharply, I may say that there is another feature in the bill relating to second mortgages that may have to be amended to achieve the proper result desired.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Briefly.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The trouble we find out in our country is that people do not have sufficient incomes to get these loans, because the lending authorities require that the applicant for a loan must have an income five times the amount of the monthly payment. Consequently they do not receive any advantage from it.

Mr. GIFFORD. That depends wholly upon the banks and how many months they will extend the credit for. Most of them spread it over 18 months. If the period is extended to 36 months, it can be handled with half the income.

Mr. Chairman, I had wanted to comment on another failure to encourage new construction, due to the effect of the Securities Act.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I asked the chairman of that Commission how much of the $5,000,000,000 that had been registered was for new construction, and I found that except for 5 percent all of it was used for refinancing and not for new construction and plant enlargement.

It might have been a good law, but it has proven a very great detriment to new business. This bill is especially for the little fellow, and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for allowing me this time. Two minutes is insufficient for me to give a real talk on the subject of slum clearance. Although I am unable to see, I can actually smell the slums in the District of Columbia. I do not think we can spend too much money in eradicating the slum districts not only in Washington, D. C., but throughout the United States. We are spending approximately $15,000,000 annually to protect society against criminals. It is my opinion if we spend about $5,000,000,000 to eradicate the slum districts of the country a great deal of the prevailing crime would be discontinued. Of course, one of the reasons why unfortunate people are compelled to live in slum districts is because they cannot find employment, and when they do find employment the wages which they receive are insufficient to keep body and soul together. One of the best ways to wipe out the slums and end poverty in our country is to furnish employment to the millions who are now unemployed and pay them not only a living wage but a saving wage. It is unnecessary for any person to be unemployed today, therefore, Mr. Chairman, we should not hesitate to support this legislation or any other kind of legislation that will help to eradicate the slum districts of our country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, continuing where I left off a few minutes ago, may I say that in 1934 the gross amount of business which had been done under title I was approximately $40,000,000. I stated that of the $40,000,000 of loans insured under title I, about $7,000,000 had been insured through the National City Bank of New York, one of the largest banking organizations in this country. Of that $7,000,000, under the present law, the United States Treasury is responsible for 20 percent, or $1,400,000, in losses. They are not even required to exert themselves if their losses are not in excess of 20 percent of their total loans.

Let us get a practical picture of the way the taxpayers' money goes in this grandiose scheme.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand the mechanics of the Federal Housing Administration, John Smith would go to Sears-Roebuck & Co. and purchase $200 worth of appliances or improvements for his home. No cash payment is required.

John Smith takes that note to an approved institution, perhaps a new-born subsidiary operating on the mezzanine of each one of its central stores, which accepts it. The name of the borrower is then sent to the Federal Housing Administration; thereupon the Federal Housing Administration becomes responsible for at least $40 of that $200 purchase under the present act, and maybe 100 percent, dependent, of course, upon the percent of collections to the total loans made.

It so happens that under title I up to the present date approximately 50 percent of the total amount of renovizing loans made through December 31, 1935, were made through institutions in New York, the National City Bank, and its branches, the Giannini banks in California, and certain banks in New Jersey.

On the present amount of loans made through the National City Bank and its branches the Federal Government is responsible for approximately $12,000,000 of its losses, and they will be there unless the shape of the world turns flat. I am merely calling these facts to your attention so that you may know what has been going on under title I of the Federal Housing Act and to convince you by the record of their performances that the amendments I am advocating are constructively sound and highly necessary. I need not tell the Members that I supported this legislation previously. I want to support it again. I believe with certain changes and more efficient coordinated administration great potentialities for good lie in this title. I am also inclined to feel and frank enough to state that with all the abuses that have crept into its administration it has helped business in certain parts of the country, even if it was done at a dear cost. I am a strong and ardent believer in a slum-clearance program, but there is nothing in the bill before us relative to that kind of housing program. I am also not making any point here today because North Carolina, for reasons which I do not care to discuss here, has not participated as much as other States in the Federal Housing programs.

Furthermore, I recognize that certain legislation is passed here from time to time which affects certain sections more than others. I have tried always not to be sectional but take as broad view of each bill as my capacity and vision would permit. I am delighted to throw what little strength I have behind any sound bill designed to aid the larger industrial centers, particularly the large cities in New York, California, and other States. We all know that a large percent of relief funds have gone into these centers. Different conditions make necessary different legislation for different parts of the country. I am merely trying to point out what has been going on so that we may correct it if possible in the House.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. This bill would not have an adverse affect on a slum-clearance program?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No. So far as repairs and alteration projects, it could be helpful—

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. In connection with the example which the gentleman gave, he stated that on a $200 purchase the Government may become responsible for 20 percent, or $40. I think the gentleman is slightly mistaken. It could become responsible for the total amount, because the F. H. A. insures 20 percent of the total loans, which may be 100 percent of any particular loan.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I thought I made that quite clear. The gentleman is, of course, correct, and I know his explanation is very helpful.

Let us see now for a few minutes what the advocates of the bill as it was reported say about it.

The gentleman from Maryland, the acting chairman of the committee, stated that under title I of the original bill there were two major objectives: First, to stimulate new construction, and, second, to stimulate the sale of electrical appliances. I differ, as is quite often the case, with my distinguished colleague in his interpretation of the purposes of title I, if that is his interpretation.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I coupled new construction and electrical appliances as one. The second objective was low financing.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. As I stated in the beginning, my conception of it, based on the testimony given before the committee by its authors and sponsors, is twofold: to create employment, and create tangible, useful wealth by putting the durable-goods industries back into action. No one who came before us in 1934 ever intimated that these objectives would be carried out by stimulating the sale of a few appliances and articles made by a few select and favored manufacturers.

There is also a difference of opinion between Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH and myself as to the cost of the operations to date. They have been high, all will admit, when you consider the small amount of business done and the real benefits to the people—not the lenders. Let us look at the record again. Based upon the answer made by the genial Administrator, Mr. McDonald, to a question propounded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], my understanding is that the expenses and cost of operating, not including losses, which, as I shall later point out, are being minimized and perhaps deferred until this legislation is passed and the election is behind, would amount to around $20,000,000 through March 31, which would be about 5 days from now. That is what I read in the record if I can understand the plain old English language.

In addition to that, the gentleman from Maryland says that approximately a million men have been put to work by the F. H. A. activities. I know that he believes that a million men have been put to work or else he would not have made the statement. I want to say, however, that his estimate is nothing in the world but a pure guess, so do not press him for an explanation or break-down of his figure. Now, I will tell you why I know it is a guess and closely akin to a majority of the wild assumptions and bloated claims of this organization. Just glance at the list of other accomplishments in their letter of transmittal.

In February 1935 Mr. McDonald told me that under the operations of the Federal Housing Administration 750,000 people had been put to work. At that time they had only been operating about 6 months. That is as ridiculous a claim as the one you will find on page 17 of the report for 1935, where they say that the modernization credit plan has directly encouraged millions of other property owners to go forward with upward of $1,000,000,000 worth of repairs and improvements. Bureau of Labor statistics show that only about $500,000,000 worth was done in the whole United States during 1935.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to correct what I think is a mistake on his part?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The question I asked Mr. McDonald was whether or not the loss was $20,000,000 for the period that would be ended on March 31, and for the proposed extended period, which, as appears on page 12 of the hearings, is December 31.

I shall continue to stick to the record. We may read it a little differently. I know the gentleman is sincere and I am sure he knows that I am, but let us keep the record straight. What do we find?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan (talking to Mr. McDONALD). Would it be fair to say that your rough estimate of cost, not now taking into consideration benefits which, I can see, would be very great, that the cost of this operation to the taxpayers of the United States for the period that will be finished on March 31, and for the proposed extended period, would be in round figures something like $20,000,000? I judge that from what you say.

Mr. McDONALD. Well, do you mean on title I or title II or both features of the act?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I mean the entire act.

Mr. McDONALD. On both features of the act, I think that is approximately correct.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Somewhere around $20,000,000?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes.

That is for the proposed extended period to December 31.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No, my friend; that would be twenty-two million, according to the record. I make this statement without fear of contradiction, that before March 31 of this year the actual expenses of operating the Federal Housing Administration will exceed $20,000,000.

I further tell you that, based upon the record and common sense, the loss estimated by them of $980,000 does not approximate the actual losses.

Any man with good, old, horse sense knows that the older the loans get the higher the curve of losses will be. These figures are based on practically new loans. Just wait and see. You will be asked to take care of the F. H. A. through a deficiency appropriation unless it is placed on a sounder operating basis. Mark my words.

Let me tell you something else about it. They probably do not believe their own statement; and I am not saying this to reflect upon them, but I will tell you why they do not. Do you know that in the Budget report they have set aside $5,000,000—

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from North Carolina 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. They have set aside $5,000,000 to cover the repurchase of notes in default for the year ending June 30, 1936. For the year ending June 30, 1937, they have included in the Budget $23,000,000. This is the record. This is not my estimate of it. Why did they not tell us this. I had to dig it up myself.

Let us examine now hurriedly the bill before us by sections.

Now, they are trying to change the method of getting rid of these repurchased notes. They want Congress to authorize a private or public sale. Under the law this repossessed property has to be turned over to the Procurement Division. Any man who understands what has been going on under title I knows there is not enough space in buildings owned by the Federal Government to store the repossessed property. What are they going to do with it? They want to take these notes, bunch them up in a package, and sell them like a pig in a bag. In the interest of the borrowers and purchasers no private sale should be authorized. I think it is bad public policy, and I shall try to strike out the words "or private", on page 1, line 10.

Mr. Chairman, talking about creating employment, do you know that out of $254,000,000 of business done under title I through December 31, 54 percent of it was in connection with the sale of plumbing, electrical appliances, and other mechanical equipment? The average loan for the year 1934 was approximately $400, the loans during the year 1935 averaged $354, and the loans in December 1935 averaged $294. Tell me where substantial employment comes there. Where is the widespread employment in installing a Frigidaire, putting in a radio, selling a vacuum cleaner, selling a stove or a range or a cream whipper, if you will. Do you believe that 800,000 loans averaging $350 would put even 250,000 people to work; and if so, how long? Is not that really silly for grown men, responsible officials, to talk about?

Mr. Chairman, let me tell you something else. These are the bare-bone facts. This report right here made to the Speaker of the House and to the President of the Senate states that through the influence of this Federal Housing Administration more than $1,000,000,000 in modernization was done in the United States in 1935. The statistics of the Labor Department show that only $524,000,000 of modernization improvements was made throughout the country during that whole year, and yet they claim credit for $1,000,000,000.

I say to you, not charging any bad motive, but there never has been, in my judgment, since I have been in this Congress, a more misinforming and misleading report filed by a responsible agency of our Government than the report of the Federal Housing Administration for both years—1934 and 1935. Examine it for yourself.

Now, what about the low-cost interest rates so much touted? Whenever you see advertised in the papers that any individual, living in America, can borrow money under title I or title II of the Federal Housing Act for 5 percent, put it down as unadulterated "baloney." You cannot get it, and I say that such advertising is unfair and misleading. It creates discontent among the present borrowers of this country, and if it is continued, it is a worthy subject for investigation by the Federal Securities Commission, which requires that all people selling and financing securities shall tell the truth and all the truth to the public. Surely a Government agency should conform to its requirements.

What is the cost to the borrower under title I? There has been right much discussion about it. I am keeping to the record. I started with it and I shall end it as the basis for my declarations.

Let the record tell the story. The interest is approximately 9.72. Under the modernization credit plan, Bulletin No. 1, page 18, the discount on a 30-month rediscount loan figures out 11.15. Nobody in this House can deny that fact. That is their own record.

More than that, regulation 3 says that on each payment in delay of 15 days the lending institution is permitted to charge the borrower 5 cents on a dollar additional. That would make the cost to him run about 14 percent.

Every bit of that is concealed in the report. That is the tragedy of it, my friends. I am not saying that it has been done in bad faith, but it has been done.

Now, if you assume that 50 percent of the cost of administration of the Federal Housing Administration was spent in the administration of title I, you will find that out of every dollar that they have insured of loans it has cost the Government almost 3 cents. That is the record, and I defy any man here to refute it.

Now, what has the Federal Housing Administration done in the way of construction of new homes in America? It has spent approximately $20,000,000 in operating expenses, and it has been responsible for the construction of 12,132 homes. That is the record. See their own report.

Now, let us see about this bill before us. I must discuss several features. The first thing they want to do, as I said awhile ago, is for Congress to give them the authority to sell these repurchase notes in bulk at private sale. Is that a sound policy? I seriously question it.

The next thing they want to do is to extend the life of this corporation to December 31, 1936. I would like to see it done under certain conditions.

They claim under section 2 that they will no longer permit the sale of electrical appliances. They have probably realized at last what they were doing. I still believe the officials here want to do the right thing.

My contention is that they can continue the sale of electrical appliances and equipment if the person to whom they sell owns the real estate or holds a lease that does not expire until 6 months after the maturity of their loan. I think that is a fair interpretation.

The whole thing hinges around the proper interpretation of what is an improvement to real estate. The language they use now is identical with the language which was in the original bill. Here is my recollection of the language: "To make loans and provide credit for the purpose of repairs, alterations, and improvement on real property."

On May 28, 1935, we changed that language and added, "and the installation of electrical appliances and equipment." In the Banking Act of 1935 we changed it a little bit more. We put in "and the purchase and installation." Therefore, my friends, unless you add before the word "improvement" the word "structural", we will never be able to carry out the original purpose of title I.

Another thing I would like to do is to cut this insurance fund down from 10 percent to 5 percent. These lending institutions collect on an average of 10 percent. They have, as I stated, the right to charge an additional 5-percent penalty. Why insure them on their total loans up to 10 percent? If they make $100,000 of these loans, why let the Government continue to be liable for $10,000? If you reduce it to 5 percent it makes the lenders more careful, and it thereby protects the Government accordingly, and in addition to that you will increase the total volume of business that can be done. Already there have been insured $300,000,000 of these loans. That involves the Government to the extent of $60,000,000 on the basis of 20 percent. In the present bill you cut it down to 10 percent guaranty, so that permits them, with the $40,000,000 remaining in the fund, to do a business of $400,000,000.

If you cut it down to 5 percent, the Federal Housing Administration can do $800,000,000 worth of business without increasing the liability of the Government. That is my contention. By adding the word "structural" you carry out the original philosophy and purpose of the title, which was to help the small-home owner in this country who had not the means nor the credit to make needed repairs to his home during the depression. In addition to that, you are protecting the United States Treasury. Unless changes are made, I predict here and now that within the next few years Congress is going to be asked to make an appropriation to take care of the losses under Federal Housing. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. I shall not oppose this bill, but in connection with its deliberations there are some things I should like to point out in the relationship between our present unemployment condition and the housing program of the Federal Government. I have nothing but admiration for the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], who time and again has shown a most persevering effort in directing attention to the problem of unemployment, and that has been emphasized, of course, by the President of the United States in his recent message to Congress, wherein he points out the appalling number of people who are unemployed at the present time. I believe that more and more Members of Congress ought to emulate Cato, the Roman tribune of old, who, realizing that some day there would be a struggle for mastery between Carthage and Rome, ended every speech he made by the statement, "Carthago delenda est"—"Carthage must be destroyed." I think we should end every speech and letter we write with the cry "unemployment must be banished", and make the Nation unemployment conscious.

My interest in the housing program and in this bill is directly related to my interest in the matter of unemployment, and by way of prelude may I say that a lot of good work done by Congress in the last year or two is going to be undone unless we solve that problem. When we set up the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to protect the homes of people against foreclosure I voted for the bill, and was glad to do so, and yet as we read the record we find that foreclosure proceedings have been instituted against 5,700 pieces of property and that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation owns 1,100 properties outright as a result of foreclosures. That is not because any home owner who has made a loan is indifferent to his loan or to the protection of his home, but is generally the result of inadequate earnings or of being jobless. That is where some of the benefits will be impaired until the unemployment problem is solved.

What is the unemployment situation at the present time? Look at the report dated March 16 from Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. He says there are 12,636,000 people unemployed in the United States at the present time.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. But in the 12,636,000 people who are unemployed are included three and a half million people who are employed on emergency relief projects, so that as a matter of fact there are 9,000,000 unemployed, approximately, according to the figures of the American Federation of Labor. Three million five hundred thousand are employed on relief projects. The gentleman is referring to figures on unemployment quoted by the American Federation of Labor. It may interest the gentleman to know that the figures 12,600,000 include 3,600,000 W. P. A. workers, according to Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The report points out that there has been an increase of only 1,024,000 in employment between January 1935 and January 1936.

The report also points out there are sixteen and one-half million people on relief. What have we done for them over a period of years?

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. In order that the Record may be clear, I think the gentleman should state that a large percentage of the foreclosures instituted by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are against people who have abandoned their property and others who, able to pay, are opposed to paying, believing that the Government should let them have their loans for nothing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. They state in their report that they are deliberate delinquents, but I do not subscribe to that view particularly. Now, what have we done about unemployment? There was the N. I. R. A., intended to eliminate child labor and absorb people in industry through the shortening of hours. We had the Civilian Conservation Corps; we had the W. P. A., P. W. A., and various others, the total cost of which was about eight and one-half billion dollars, yet we have the brutal stark fact that there are some twelve and one-half million unemployed in this country at the present time.

When the first flash of the housing idea came along about 2 years ago I looked forward to it with a great deal of hope. I thought that, inasmuch as millions of people were unemployed who were formerly identified with the building industry, men who swing a hammer and push a saw, men who drive brick trucks, and who unload cement cars and all that sort of thing, might very readily find employment if there was a real worth-while housing program. What have we now by way of a housing program? First of all, there was allotted $125,000,000 to the P. W. A. Housing Division. They did not spend a dime for actual construction. They did not build a house. They finally suspended for a little while when the P. W. A. Emergency Housing Corporation came along. They had an allotment of $100,000,000. The Comptroller General said they could not legally expend any money. What result? They never built a house. They never built a housing unit. So the Housing Division came back again. They started in with the idea of low-cost housing to be done by private contractors. They finally determined that private enterprise could not draw up the kind of plan or meet the requirements that was in accord with the desires of the Federal Housing Division under the P. W. A. Then came the Louisville decision, in which a Federal court said that the Housing Division could not exercise the right of eminent domain under the Constitution, so they had to forget most of the private projects and address themselves to public projects. What is the record today after a lapse of almost 2 years? They completed seven private projects. They have thirty-some-odd public projects under way at a total cost of about $140,000,000. This is a mere drop in the bucket when you stop to consider that fire has been destroying $450,000,000 worth of property every year for the last 15 years. It is a drop in the bucket when you consider that they tore down 9,000 structures in Philadelphia and 11,000 in Chicago in the last few years. So we have had so little real results out of the so-called P. W. A. Housing Division.

Now, then, we had the subsistence homestead projects. I went up to Reedsville, W. Va., to take a look at this phenomenon. It is intriguing, it is instructive, it is inspiring for anybody to go out and take a look. On some of those houses they had to blow out the foundations in order to make the ready-made houses fit. On many the windows would not fit in the frames, and today if you will ask Mr. Pynchon, who was director of subsistence homesteads, he will probably tell you we are going to stand a loss of over $3,000 a house on one-hundred-and-sixty-one-odd houses at Reedsville, and that ultimately Uncle Sam will suffer a loss of at least a million dollars before we get through. They have had some of these projects in different parts of the country. They have now abandoned over 56 subsistence-homestead projects.

We have at the present time the Rural Resettlement Administration. They are building a big project out at Beltsville. They have a tremendous pay roll down there. But as you evaluate all that has been done under any kind of a housing program, be it the Housing Division, the Emergency Housing Corporation, the Subsistence Homesteads or Rural Resettlement, the result is almost nil. The fact remains we have about twelve and one-half million people unemployed. The fact remains we have spent over eight and one-half billion dollars for unemployment and unemployment relief, and the message of the President of the United States, without my resorting to intemperate language or being a captious critic, is, in my judgment, a confession that after all this expenditure we have not solved the unemployment problem, and it remains for private industry ultimately to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the gentleman think, then, we have to reach another logical conclusion, that even with the assistance of the Government private industry has not been able, and will not be able, to reabsorb the unemployed?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is some merit, I would say, in the contention of the gentleman from California, insofar as it applies to manufacturing. That is why I agreed with the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] that the entire hope of a durable, lasting kind of recovery, that will really be worth while, must necessarily be identified with some kind of housing program. It becomes necessary now for the administration, as I see it, to call in builders and architects, labor leaders, and financiers, to call in people who have had some practical experience with the program of housing, to come here and fabricate some kind of a program which the Federal administration can endorse and which will work. The very fact that we have had a conference going on for some time between the American Committee on Economic Security, the American Federation of Labor, and others, to fabricate a housing program, and the fact that it has been reported in the press that the President of the United States said our housing efforts had been a mess is the best indication that it has been a failure.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT], could you not answer that instead of the Federal Government's assisting private business, the Federal Government, by going into direct competition with private business, has destroyed it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very largely so; yes.

Mr. SHORT. That one thing has retarded recovery more than anything else.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further for a moment. Now, when the Federal Housing Administration came along, the very fact that they used the word "housing", filled me with some degree of inspiration and hope that we were going to get some organization that was actually going to build houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I thought it was going to be something that would put these craftsmen to work, the millions who were out of work. At the present time, under title II, the Federal Housing Administration can insure mortgages on new construction and on old construction also; and what the gentleman from North Carolina said about its failure insofar as new construction is concerned, is borne out by the second annual report made by the Federal Housing Administration covering the year ending December 31, 1935. Altogether they accepted mortgages for insurance to the number of 42,147. Of this number, 12,360 were on new construction. It is their own report. Substantially only 25 percent of the mortgages accepted for insurance under the mutual-mortgage plan were for new construction. It is nothing but a confession that the Housing Administration, so far as new houses are concerned, has been a dismal failure. This is the reason for my interest in a change of the language in the present bill, so they can go on and build new houses under title I. It may be there will be some abuses, but after all, the program must be measured in terms of how remedial it will be of our unemployment problem.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. After listening to the very brilliant address of the gentleman from Illinois, I would make the observation that the logical conclusion to be drawn from what he has said is that we should stop this right now. I do not think, however, the gentleman wants to do that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Replying to the gentleman from California, I may say I am interested in any kind of program that will take up these idle hands; that will give relief to these men who sally forth day after day trying to find jobs but come home at night empty-handed. I am in favor of any program that will stop the bitter cry of the children who must go to bed at night without supper because the breadwinner of the family is not working. In respect of unemployment the administration has not done very much, as indicated by the President's own message to the Congress.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I wanted to make a suggestion and help reply to the question propounded about private industry and the gentleman's desire that something be done here in Washington. I would suggest that those who come to Washington to fabricate a plan must be those who have listened not more than 3 weeks to instruction under Professor Frankfurter.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. The logical conclusion of the gentleman's argument is that we should leave things alone and leave it to private industry. Does not the gentleman think, inasmuch as we have left it to private industry without getting any noticeable result, the indication is we ought to have a mass building of homes—a huge program under the Government of the United States?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sorry I cannot be responsible for the misapprehension of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAVERICK. I know; but the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I am glad to yield to my friend on the committee.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman, I know, means to be fair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Indeed.

Mr. SISSON. In the gentleman's statement as to the number of mortgages that have been insured on new construction he should, of course, inform the Committee that this part of title II had to be newly organized. They had to start from nothing. It was an entirely new set-up, and they did not really get into operation under it until about last July. The public, as the gentleman knows; the bankers, as the gentleman knows; the lending institutions, as the gentleman knows; all had to be informed of this as a new method of lending money and of insuring mortgages. So this period of about 8 or 9 months affords hardly sufficient experience to determine whether it is going to be an efficient recovery measure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In my judgment, that is not the reason they failed so dismally in the new-construction program.

Mr. SISSON. I do not concede they have failed dismally, and I think this is the opinion of the majority of the American people.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The real reason is we have had a lot of swivel-chair, blueprint bureaucrats down here who do not know much about housing, who hold such careful scrutiny over every mortgage and over every home proposed to be built that it is almost impossible to satisfy them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, let us look at what they do. When Mr. Walsh, of the F. H. A., came before the committee I asked him about it and he very kindly put his memorandum in the record. He said:

Our standards have been carefully designed with the small house in view and it may be confidently said that houses meeting these standards can be produced in nearly any part of the country for $1,500 or less. There can be no complaint, therefore, that our standards rule out the possibility of a workman's home.

Exaggerated complaint has been made on the score of our neighborhood requirements. These requirements are extremely modest, but, so far as they go, they do offer to this home investment some assurance that a family's life savings will not be destroyed by thoughtless or unscrupulous developers. We seek to avoid the type of exploitation which has resulted in high-pressure selling such families property removed from schools and market centers, stranded as to transportation, endangered by lack of fire protection, and subject to great health hazard from polluted water or inadequate sewage disposal. We have, where possible, required sufficient deed restrictions to prevent obnoxious land uses from destroying the values which these families hope to establish.

There is nothing in any of this that makes houses more expensive, or which should diminish the volume of new construction. On the other hand, through requiring that homes for modest families be honestly built, and that the minimum of protection be assured to their investments, more such families may be encouraged to build. We have only to look at the dilapidated houses of the last boom and the disillusionment of their purchasers to realize the blight upon building which a short-sighted policy can produce.

As a result of such regulations in one case within my own experience they sought to tell the builder how many closets he had to put in a bathroom before they would approve the loan, or how many closets must be put in a bedroom. If this kind of surveillance, this kind of control is to be vested here in Washington, D. C., amongst some 3,800 people administering this set-up, obviously it is not going to get any further than it has gotten in the matter of giving us a real housing program that will absorb the millions at present unemployed.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I have a real admiration for the gentleman from Illinois, and I know he wants to be fair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I try to be at all times.

Mr. DINGELL. I know he is striving to achieve the same purposes that we are all striving for in connection with relief and unemployment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is, after all, the vital question.

Mr. DINGELL. About a year and a half ago I made an extensive survey throughout the United States of this very question. As a result of that survey—and I do not want to take up too much of the gentleman's time—I am convinced that approximately 4,000,000, or 40 percent of the 10,000,000 unemployed are directly in the building trades and about three additional million could be absorbed if we eliminate the building-trades unemployed by the allied and associated industries; in other words, the dependent trades like the brickmakers and the manufacturers in the heavy industries, such as lumber mills, saw mills, and the like.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman that irrespective of the claims which are made, and quite aside from all the conjecture and the guess work that has been indulged in, as to how many men have been put to work under this kind of a program, the fact remains we have over sixteen and a half million people on relief this afternoon and we have over twelve and a half million unemployed. You cannot escape that fact. I do not care how presumptuous their claims may be, those are the figures and they indicate what Mr. Hopkins has to contend with.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. There are a great many people without work, but is it not true that the fault does not lie with the Federal Housing Administration so far as the building situation is concerned, but, rather, the fault lies to a great degree with the industry which manufactures materials for housing? If the gentleman will look up the record, I believe he will find that these industries, which have become more or less monopolistic, have been able to do the uneconomical thing in a depression of holding up the price level. If they had come down in the depression period, like the price of farm commodities, there would have been increased purchasing and more homes built. Then, too, there is a difficulty which lies with some of the private builders. They want to play the game that the F. H. Smith Co. played here in the District of Columbia. They want to sell bonds at unreasonable prices, but with the Federal Security set-up they have to play the game straight and they do not want to play it that way. I do not believe we can blame the Federal Housing Administration. I believe they are doing a good job in their sphere. Price fixing on the part of monopolies engaged in the manufacture of durable goods and also the old profiteering and racketeering that has been driven out of the business has to a degree retarded the construction program.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, to answer the gentleman from New York would take considerable time. May I suggest to the Members that they get hold of the hearings and read what Mr. Carnahan placed in the record on page 52.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. Chairman, there appears a letter from the Miller Lumber Co., Seattle, dated March 1, 1936. If the Members will read that, they will get a pretty good idea about what has been going on with respect to new construction, and possibly a good idea of what may be done to give this Government a real housing program that will build houses, a program such as has been taking place in Great Britain and elsewhere.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CURLEY. In arriving at the figure of 16,000,000 unemployed, has the gentleman from Illinois given credit to the advancing age of the young men and young women who have attained 21 years, and who have been absorbed into the present records of the Department of Labor?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If we included all those, the figure would be larger than it is at the present time.

Mr. CURLEY. Does not the record show there are at least three and a half million such?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is difficult to assemble the records in reference to those things. The fact remains that when all the sound and fury has been spent, when all the fancy rhetoric has vanished into thin air, when all the alibis have been made, when all the defenses have been offered, when all the explanations have been presented, it remains a known fact that we have more than twelve and one-half million unemployed after the expenditure of more than eight and one-half billions of dollars over a 3-year period. Instead of, ostrichlike, sticking our heads in the sand and evading this real vital problem, let us recognize it for what it is and get to work on a durable solution.

If I appear unduly critical of the Federal Housing Administration, it is not that I am unsympathetic to its purposes but, rather, that I feel it has not accomplished what was hoped or expected. We must get results. We must deal with unemployment. A worth-while housing program seems to be the answer, especially when we bear in mind that an improvement in manufacturing to a point where it will reach 1929 levels will only absorb a small proportion of those now unemployed.

Instead of this indifferent, hit-and-miss policy under which we have a Home Owners' Loan, a Federal Housing Administration, a Subsistence Homesteads Division, a P. W. A. Housing Division, a P. W. A. Emergency Housing Corporation, a Resettlement Administration, an Electric Home and Farm Authority, and, perhaps, other agencies that deal with home building, home financing, and home appliances and repairs, let us insist on calling in a group of practical business, labor, and financial leaders to promulgate a housing venture in the spirit of helpful cooperation that will succeed. Let us adopt the psychology of Cato and continue to demand that unemployment must be banished. From that insistence will come tangible results.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARLEY].

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are finally getting back to the original intent of this act, which was to take up the slack in unemployment. One of my colleagues made the statement this afternoon that there was very little labor employed in connection with the installation of a refrigerating plant or something of that character. I concede he is right in that respect. It does not take much time for a man to install a refrigerator. But he failed to go back to the beginning, to the point where the raw material is taken out of the ground. He failed to go back to where the pig iron is originally made. He did not review the steps which these materials take until they become a thermostat control in one of these refrigerating plants. In order to estimate labor's contribution to this we must go back to the beginning. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggested that this had up to now failed to start new industry and new business.

Personally I do not want to see very much new business of any type started where it takes new equipment and where it requires new buildings. I go back to the conclusion of the World War in 1920, when bankers and industrialists everywhere told us to expand, expand and get ready for the big things that were bound to come, until the time came when we overexpanded and when the crash came what was really the matter, as much as any other one thing, was the fact we were in debt and overexpanded at every point. [Applause.]

What we are really trying to do now is to put ourselves in position to rehabilitate industry and put it on a safe, fair, and sound basis.

I contend the Housing Administration has done a good job. It takes time to do these things. When you start out on a big enterprise or building up a big industry you set aside a certain amount of money for experimental work, another amount of money for advertising and for the selling of the proposition. I think this housing program has progressed very finely. It has cost too much money to do it up to the present time, and if we should stop now there would be a loss, but we have every reason to believe that, continued for another year, with the ground work already laid, it will bear very much better fruit in the future.

I do not want us to reach the point where there will be any attempt at overexpansion. I dislike the idea of having them go from house to house to urge people, indiscriminately, to take on this additional financial burden, but this was something that had to be sold to the country. First, it had to be sold to the bankers, it had to be sold to the people generally throughout the land, and this work is well in hand and should be continued.

We have provided in this bill for a reduction to 10 percent of the insurance, with the total amount not to exceed $100,000,000. My good friend the gentleman from North Carolina suggests that this insurance should be cut to 5 percent. My contention is if we reduced it to 5 percent, we might just as well take it all off entirely. The result would be to destroy rather than to build up the law.

I believe this is an outstandingly good measure and is one that should pass. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I also represent a district such as that mentioned by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], the chairman of the Rules Committee, and also the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], who spoke here today.

I can speak with some little authority on this question inasmuch as I have had some 35 years of experience in the building industry in the city of New York. I have attended a great many conferences in the city since I have become a Member of the House of Representatives, and I want to stress this point very forcefully. It was the building industry that was the first to suffer at the beginning of this depression, and it was the last to receive any help whatsoever in all our efforts to give relief throughout the country.

I can say further, as one familiar with this great industry, that the building industry will never see recovery in this country until the building trades come back to their own and they are all working 8 hours a day.

Here is a little history for you: In Manhattan, one of the great boroughs of the city of New York, we have 29,056 existing old-law tenements, with 335,042 flats.

In the Borough of Brooklyn we have 31,353, with 148,199 flats.

In the Borough of the Bronx, where I live, we have 4,620, with 31,737 flats.

In the Borough of Queens we have 1,632, with 7,044 flats.

In the Borough of Richmond we have 291, with 1,164 flats.

This makes a total of 66,952 of these old-law tenements, with a total of 523,386 flats, holding something like 1,500,000 people in the city of New York.

I sat in my seat here listening to some of the gentlemen here giving forth some of their cheap satire at the efforts of this administration to give relief, but they do not stop to consider that this child of the depression was not born with the Democratic Party, but it had been petted and pampered for 12 years when it was healthy by Republican administrations and then dumped into the lap of Franklin Delano Roosevelt when it became sick on March 4, 1933.

I recently attended a conference of members of the building trades of this country at the Hamilton Hotel here, and they mapped out a program of so-called relief that would stimulate the great building industry throughout the country. They did not talk about $100,000,000; they talked about $500,000,000; and back in 1920, when there was a housing crisis in the city of New York, $1,500,000,000 for this purpose was suggested.

Mr. Chairman, the housing problem in the city of New York, also all other populous and wealthy cities in the United States, is of more commanding importance than any other public or private undertaking. How can we hope to stamp out disease, insanity, and crime; how, in fact, can we hope to diminish their blight unless we see to it that those who cannot protect themselves are protected by the people at large, which means governmental agencies?

What I am concerned with most in this effort by the Democratic administration is the attempt to give relief to residents in the congested sections in the greater urban centers, such as exists in New York City in the blighted so-called slum areas.

There are three specific important features in connection with this proposed housing program. First, the stimulation of the building industry through the finance program of the Federal administration. Second, the protection of the health of the tenants in the aforesaid blighted areas. Third, it will reduce the number of unemployed.

In addition to that such a construction program that has for its object rehabilitation of such of these tenement houses as are not obsolete and are in a state wherein they may be rehabilitated and brought up to modern, decent living condition is a grave necessity. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill, although I do not entirely believe in its philosophy, because I believe the time has come when the American people ought to get out of debt. I believe that the Government ought not to urge men and women to go into debt. I feel that the time has come when we all ought to get out of debt. That is why we are for the Frazier-Lemke refinancing bill. [Applause.]

The necessity for this bill is apparent to every person, because as a people we have not sufficient credit. We are swamped with debts. There are three hundred billion—some say three hundred and seventy-nine billion—public and private debts in this Nation. This bill will help to give us more credit and help get the unemployed busy again. That is what we are striving for, to get the men and women off relief and give them more work on useful projects.

The reason we are in this desperate situation is because there is not enough actual money in circulation to do the Nation's business, and until we get the courage in this House to give the Nation the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, legislation of this kind is essential and necessary.

Therefore, I am for this bill, and the farm bloc is for this bill. The farm bloc is for any bill that will help the unemployed and the distressed in the cities and towns as well as on the farms. We are for this bill in spite of the fact that we are denied a vote on the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. We are for it because we feel it is for the best interests of this country. We are for it because we feel it will assist in giving to the unemployed an American standard of living.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to say that I am not one of those who have been opposed to bringing out the gentleman's bill.

Mr. LEMKE. I am proud to say that the gentleman is not. We need just a few more signatures to bring the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill out on the floor for a vote.

I hope we will get it out, because we must reestablish representative government here on the floor of this House. If we fail in this the American people will lose confidence in us and in Congress.

In the meantime we must save the homes of this Nation. I am sorry the committee did not bring a bill out, but I hope some time soon the Banking and Currency Committee will bring a bill out that will save the square miles of homes now under foreclosure in the city of Chicago.

Let us save all the homes of the Nation. It can be done, and it must be done, or this Nation cannot continue as a democracy. It cannot continue as a free government, because when you have a great majority of the people no longer owning their own homes, you have no government worthy of the name, whether you call it a republican form or any other kind of a government. Homes make a nation stable; homes make a nation secure. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, we wholeheartedly support this bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Something has been said which would make this bill appear as a step toward slum clearance. Is that the gentleman's opinion of this bill? Do you not believe that something should be done for the people living in the slum districts of our large cities?

Mr. LEMKE. This bill has nothing to do with slum clearance. I can see the need of slum clearance if it is done to help the people living in the slum districts and to improve sanitary conditions, but slum clearance in the recent past has too often been used to save real-estate owners and to put up expensive structures, thus crowding the poor into other slums in place of helping them out of the slums. I am for the bill under consideration because it will put men to work.

Mr. CURLEY. Does the gentleman think it is a funny matter to talk about slum clearance, where a million and a half of suffering people in New York live?

Mr. LEMKE. I said this bill had nothing to do with slum clearance.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I am primarily interested in the Housing Act from the standpoint of the number of men that it has caused to be employed, the volume of materials, both manufactured and raw, that it has caused to be utilized, and from the standpoint of its social value. Its social value arises from the fact that it enabled thousands of people in the United States, who, because of 4 or 5 years of depression, were unable to keep their homes in repair and to rehabilitate residential rental property. We can discuss the technical details of the bill and its cost all night and get nowhere. What I am interested in is the primary objective of the bill. I repeat, that the primary objective is the reemployment of labor, the utilization of raw and manufactured materials, with the backlog of labor and the social benefits that accrue from a program of this character.

In the State of California under title I, $39,516,179 worth of improvements to homes and residential income property were made. Last year, in 1935, our building permits for ordinary new construction in Los Angeles ran from $28,000,000 to $29,000,000, as against $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 the year before, and I am satisfied in my own mind and from what people have told me that many of these structures were erected because the people of Los Angeles were able to secure the necessary financing under the titles of this bill. For that reason I am in favor of the measure, not altogether the one we have on the table for I would like to see the bill amended in one or two particulars, and in that event I think we would have a sane, sound measure, one that would contribute to the upbuilding of employment, to the wide spread of great social benefits, to the utilization of vast quantities of raw material in the way of lumber, cement, brick and mortar, and all of the things that go with them and in the use of manufactured articles like electrical and plumbing equipment, which have a big backlog of labor behind them. I know that there is a great deal of criticism by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. They point out how it did not do this or that. They seem to forget that we walked in here in 1933 in a crisis. Our good friends of the previous administration had dumped a nice big depression into our lap and we have been struggling for the last 3 years. Because of the unsound policies in the previous 12 years, they were responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] a few moments ago made a remark about some article contributed by Mr. Carnahan, page 52 of the hearings. I am intimately acquainted with Mr. Carnahan, and anything that he might say in regard to this bill I would be inclined, not even knowing what he said, to go along with him, because I believe he is competent and in a position to know what he is talking about, and I would support it.

Mr. Chairman, the part of the National Housing Act of June 1934 which authorizes the issuance of insurance for loans made for modernization purposes will cease on and after April 1, 1936, unless appropriate action is taken by Congress prior to that date.

In more than 8,000 communities throughout the United States volunteer better housing committees have been established through the aid and with the cooperation of the Federal Housing Administration, and these committees have acted to instill into the minds of home owners the necessity and desirability of home modernization and improvement. The amount has far exceeded a billion of dollars in work done and contracted for. This means that this vast sum of money has been placed in the channels of trade and industry for durable goods and the reemployment of tens of thousands of workers in the building and allied trades industries. It means that men and women have been taken off the relief rolls and placed on pay rolls.

In my own State of Kansas the housing canvass of last year, established primarily to determine the facts about modernization needs throughout the State, showed that 11,782 families were interested in building new homes. It is probable there are thousands of other Kansans who have wanted new homes for several years, but have not been able to carry out their plans because of general conditions. The mutual mortgage insurance department of the F. H. A. was designed to serve such cases.

Advantages offered the prospective builders of new homes are that F. H. A. financing means one mortgage, the end of refinancing problems, a fair and controlled interest rate, and service charge. A further advantage of the F. H. A. financing plan for new construction is in the monthly payment plan, which, because a longer period of years is allowed for repayment, makes it possible for each monthly payment to be reduced to a minimum charge. In addition to this the monthly payment covers interest, repayment of loan, taxes, fire insurance, and mortgage insurance.

The F. H. A. is serving a very useful purpose by making it possible for many persons to secure loans who otherwise would not be able to make them, but the F. H. A. loans no money itself and never attempts to interfere with private loans; in fact, applicants are urged to make loans in the regular course if they can, but through the F. H. A. plan it is possible for many persons to finance mortgages, new construction, and repair or remodeling work who have not been able to make satisfactory financial arrangements elsewhere. One of the best things about F. H. A. loans is that usually it does not take long to get one approved—2 weeks or less being the average time; and of the 2,600 or more applications handled in Kansas during the last 12 months there were on hand at the close of business March 1, 1936, less than 90 applications. The volume in Kansas alone has passed the $6,000,000 mark.

It is highly desirable that this effort should be continued; that it should not lapse on April 1, when there is vast opportunity for this character of construction during the summer season. Its continuation means a continuance of employment for the workers not only who supply the materials but for those who actually perform the labor of construction; furthermore, it means a still further opening up of opportunity for idle capital for profitable and safe investment; and it means the improvement, repair, and modernization of American homes, increasing their real and substantial worth as well as the comfort, convenience, and well-being of those who own them. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill amends title I of the National Housing Act in several particulars:

First. Authority is granted to the Administrator to dispose of property acquired through default of modernization loans under regulations to be prescribed by the Administrator and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and to compromise claims. This change in the law was made for the purpose of enabling the Administrator of the Federal Housing Act to handle in a more advantageous and expeditious manner the default obligations that have been and will be turned over to the Federal Housing set-up by the loaning institutions. Under this amendment the Housing Administration will not be hampered by State laws in the manner of realizing upon such assets.

Second. The authority of the Federal Housing Administrator under the original act to insure loans for modernizing and improving homes expires on April 1, 1936, and the pending bill extends the expiration time of title I to December 31, 1936, or to such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available.

Third. Insured modernization loans can be made only to owners of real property or to lessees of real property under a lease for a period of not less than 6 months. Formerly loans made to monthly tenants could be insured. The maximum loan on improved commercial real estate, hospitals, schools, and so forth, is reduced from $50,000 to $25,000, and property improved by churches is made eligible for insured loans.

Fourth. The amount of insurance is reduced from 20 percent to 10 percent of the total amount insured.

Fifth. The maximum insurance liability of the Administrator under title I is reduced from $200,000 to $100,000.

Sixth. Section 3 of the title, which authorizes the Administrator to make loans upon the security of insured notes, is repealed.

When the National Housing Act passed the Seventy-third Congress it received practically the unanimous support of both sides of the House and Senate, for the reason that everybody, including Democrats, Republicans, Progressives, and Farmer-Labor representatives, was looking for some method or program that would put men to work, particularly a program that would enlist the cooperation of the citizenship of the country in making work for our army of unemployed.

The building industry in particular was severely hit by the depression. The 1,500,000 carpenters and mechanics who before the depression were engaged in the various phases of the building industry were unemployed, and this army of our citizens, together with their families, constituted a large element of the unemployed found on the relief rolls of the country.

The National Housing Act had two titles—title I and title II—and this bill only concerns title I, which provides for the insuring up to 20 percent of the total loans of any lending institution, loaned for the purpose of renovating and repairing homes.

Title II deals entirely with the matter of insuring mortgages eligible for insurance made on old homes and newly constructed homes. While we are not concerned at the present time with title II, I want to say that while title II was slow in getting into action, so to speak, it is functioning very satisfactorily today, and it would appear from the statements of those who are informed that it has made possible the building of many homes in the past year, and it will undoubtedly be a great aid to the home builders in the future.

The National Housing set-up entered upon a new field of national activities. It constituted a pioneering movement to interest those citizens of our country who were financially able to make expenditures for the improving of their homes to do so through the aid of local lending institutions, and thereby contributing their little part in a Nation-wide movement to put men to work. It was estimated that there were at the time the Housing Act was passed 16,000,000 homes in this country that needed repairs and improvements, and the National Housing Act was designed to organize a united country-wide drive by such a class of our citizens to decrease the army of our unemployed through the repairing of said homes. The Housing Act was intended to encourage the granting of character loans for the purpose of putting men to work through home repairs. When the act was passed there were only 115 institutions in this country that would loan on character, while at the present time, as a result of the educational program carried on by the Housing Administration, there are probably 7,000 such institutions who are now making character loans to citizens who are willing to join in the work of repairing and remodeling their homes and thereby create jobs for the unemployed.

While the National Housing Administration has insured only about $300,000,000 worth of loans, it is stated that for every dollar of insured loans made by the Housing Administration that $5 more of uninsured loans were made to carry out the purpose of this act. In other words, $1,500,000,000 of repairs and improvements on the homes of this country have resulted from the National Housing Act.

I recall that when the National Housing Act was before our committee in the Seventy-third Congress a representative of the administration—I do not recall just who the person was—came before our committee and stated that the Government could well afford to pay $200,000,000 to get a billion dollars' worth of work done in repairing the homes of the country. And it was because of such a belief on the part of the administration that $200,000,000 was set aside in the act to take care of the Government liabilities, that might result from the insuring of the loans made by loaning institutions to the citizens who wanted to repair and fix up their homes, the liability of the Government under the act being to the amount of 20 percent of the loans insured by any loaning institution.

There can be no question at all but that in view of the huge sum that the Government has been paying out for relief, that it would be advantageous from the financial standpoint of the Government to assume liability of $200,000,000 for every billion dollars' worth of work done in this country in the way of giving employment to our jobless army, because the more work the less relief.

Now, what are the facts as to the cost of the Housing set-up to date, or its total cost if title I should expire on April 1? The testimony is that to date only about a million dollars has been lost, and that is not all lost because it is estimated that the Housing Administration will recover about 15 percent of such losses through the sale of the defaulted paper or through future collections. The Administration officials represent that as the matter stands today it is safe to conclude that the total cost to the Government of its program for insuring advances to the citizens to improve their homes will not exceed $10,000,000.

One of the speakers who has spoken in opposition to the pending bill contended that the older the paper, that the Government has guaranteed to the amount of 20 percent, becomes, the more worthless the paper will be and the greater the losses of the Housing Administration. I think such a conclusion is unjustified. Every time a citizen who borrows money to improve his home makes a payment on the note the better that note becomes, and the less likely the citizen is to default in its payment. Of course, any paper that the Government has insured that has run many months without payment might come under the charge that it was getting more worthless every day, but as a general proposition on all installment purchases, and the program of the Housing Administration is nothing more or less than an installment purchase, the paper becomes better and safer every time a monthly payment is made. And so there is every reason for believing that with only a loss of a million dollars to date, that the total loss to the Government covering all notes that are insured will not exceed $10,000,000.

Again, the administration was so hopeful of the good results coming from the housing program from the standpoint of losses that it has recommended, and the recommendation is incorporated in the pending bill, that the Government's liability be cut down from $200,000,000 to $100,000,000, and that the extent of the insurance on each loan or group of loans be cut from 20 percent to 10 percent. In other words, this amendment means that the indications are that $100,000,000 will take care of the Government's liability under title I, and that because of the small losses the work will go on with the encouragement of only a 10-percent insurance on the money loaned instead of a 20-percent insurance as provided by the present law.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am in favor of this bill, and the gentleman is making a powerful argument in support of it; but the thought in my mind is, why should title I be limited to December 31, 1936? Why not extend its life into next year, when the Congress will be in session, so that if we want to extend it, we will have an opportunity to do so?

Mr. REILLY. I am in accord with the views of my colleague from Massachusetts. I think the expiration time should be fixed as April 1, 1937, instead of December 31, 1936, and it is my intention at the proper time to offer an amendment to the bill fixing the date when the authority of the Administrator to insure loans under the act shall expire as of April 1, 1937.

I understand that some of the Members believe that it would be better to terminate the life of title I of the National Housing Act at a time when Congress is not in session, because of the fact that if Congress is in session the Members will be bombarded with letters and telegrams from interested parties that might influence the better judgment of the Members of Congress as to what should be done with title I as regards the prolonging of its life.

I do not agree with this view. I believe the National Housing Act has been a success. I believe that title I has accomplished all it was expected to do in the way of creating jobs, and I believe that Congress ought to be in session when the expiration date of title I will arrive, so, if the situation is such in the judgment of Congress that the life of said title I should be prolonged, Congress will be in a position to act accordingly. It seems to me that the Members of this House ought to be courageous enough as representatives of the people to say "no" when they think a law, a bureau, or a commission has outlived its usefulness. [Applause.]

Nobody knows or ever will know just how much good title I of the Housing Act has been in the way of bringing about recovery, but the men in the building industry and the supply industry ought to know better than any other class of our citizens what the results of title I have been, and these men, as far as I have been able to discover, all say that title I has been a great help to their respective lines of business and that it should be continued.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say that in my State of West Virginia they have found it most beneficial to the stimulation of the heavy industries. The lumber business has shown a substantial gain. The men who get the timber from the hills find it has been of much help, in that repair and improvement of homes has come about through help advanced in the matter of loans. It is a real recovery measure and should be continued.

Mr. REILLY. I thank my colleague for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. All time under the rule has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title I of the National Housing Act, as amended, be further amended as follows:

Section 1 of title I is amended by adding at the end of said section the following paragraph:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator shall have the power, under and subject to regulations prescribed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to assign or sell at public or private sale, or otherwise dispose of, any evidence of debt, contract claim, property, or security assigned to or held by him, and to collect or compromise all obligations assigned to or held by him and all legal or equitable rights accruing to him in connection with the payment of insurance under section 2 of this title, until such time as such obligations may be referred to the Attorney General for suit or collection."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 1, strike out "or private" in line 10, and "or otherwise disposed of" in line 11.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will be as brief as I can. If this amendment is adopted it means that the Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration will have to advertise for public sale and disposition the notes, liens, or chattels recovered. My understanding is that the laws of many of the States require this procedure. It will not hamper the Administrator in making compromises of these different claims where conditions and circumstances so warrant and justify. I believe that the amendment is sound from a standpoint of public policy and I know it will tend to give added protection to the borrowers. This is my first concern. It should insure that speculators shall not profit at the expense of the borrowers or the Government.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Would the gentleman confine the amendment to claims of larger size? I suppose in the case of small claims the price of advertising may be as large as the face value of the claim.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I do not think that would be true. My understanding is that the procedure would be to get together all claims arising in a particular section and advertise them at one time. As I understand it every proper effort will be made by the Administrator to assist the original purchaser in retaining possession of the appliance or mechanical equipment.

Mr. Chairman, may I also, as a matter of fairness to the House, state that this amendment was offered by me in committee and rejected, but I now offer it for the consideration of the House, feeling that the committee did not have the time to adequately consider its merits. You know this measure came to us from the Federal Housing Administration only about 2 weeks ago. That seems to be the practice and strategy of some of the departments and especially where the legislation is of questionable wisdom and merit.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The gentleman states that the statutes of most States provide only for the public sale of securities of this character. I disagree with that statement. As far as the statutes of Michigan are concerned they are almost identical with the provisions of this bill, and I am reliably informed and believe the provision of this bill follows the practice in the various States of the Union with reference to the sale of securities of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina should prevail it would mean that when the Federal Housing Administration received a number of notes for say $300, $400, or $600, that they had to take over from the various banks because the notes were not paid, they would have to go into every State in the Union where those notes were given and advertise them in the daily or weekly newspapers for sale at a public sale. It seems to me, Mr.

Chairman, that would unnecessarily complicate the procedure of obtaining payment on these notes. Furthermore, it would add greatly to the expense of securing ultimate payment or settlement on these notes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that this probably will be the only way the original purchasers will have any notice as to the disposition of their property?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. No; I disagree with the gentleman. I think the Federal Housing Commission would, in due course, write to every note maker asking him to pay these notes. I think the Commission will give them an opportunity to negotiate for the payment of the notes and perhaps allow some kind of a discount so that the notes may be paid insofar as the ability of the maker will permit that to be done.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered in committee and came as close to being unanimously voted down as it was possible, to be without being unanimous. I hope the Members of the House will back the committee on this proposition and defeat the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in 1934, in the early days of the Seventy-third Congress, I helped organize a group of 26 Members of the House, representing all political parties and the industrial and agricultural groups in this body, to call upon the President of the United States and enlist his aid in support of a housing act. After a very sympathetic interview with the President, the machinery was set in motion the next day by the National Emergency Council to prepare the necessary legislation. We enacted later what is now called the National Housing Act. Many of us had hoped that here was an opportunity in the field of new home construction to put men to work in the large industrial centers. In my community, for instance, there were 60,000 organized building tradesmen out of work and a healthy demand for new construction. When the operations began under this National Housing Act we found the General Motors Co., the Johns-Manville Co., the American Radiator Co., and others dictating to Mr. James Moffett and his assistants, thereby giving effect to title I alone. I saw the books and records of the administration of title I of the act. Mr. Moffett was kind enough to show me the record of earnings of the American Radiator Co. and the General Motors Co., which earnings were approximately $2,000,000 in excess for each company in 1935 over the year before. Some men were put to work because of the administration of title I of the act, but not enough.

Mr. Chairman, at that time men were walking the streets looking for work, and today are still eager to work. No attempt was made to give any life to title II except promises that the banks and insurance companies would help. Now we have the opportunity to do something. This is not a solution of the whole housing problem, but it will help, and this Congress before it leaves Washington this session ought to pass legislation which will create a revolving fund of not less than $100,000,000 to bring about employment in the new construction field. You Members from the flood area are going to be affected by this legislation, and it is to your interest to support this bill.

Under title I it is permissible at the present time for the banks qualified under the act to loan up to $2,000. Thousands of homes have been built under the provisions of title I. They are cottages, small homes. Call them shacks, if you will, but they are homes. Many homes have been wiped out as a result of the flood. In the Johnstown (Pa.) area, and the entire flood sections of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and the New England States, for instance, five-, six-, or ten-thousand-dollar homes are gone forever. Some of these owners might be glad to get the opportunity to borrow $2,000 to build a small house until they can get on their feet. That is what will happen if this legislation passes.

Mr. Chairman, we have allowed huge corporations like the Johns Manville Co. and the General Motors Co. and a few others to run the show. In other words, the tail is wagging the dog, if I may use that figure of speech. It is high time that we give effect to this sort of legislation and call a halt to some extent to lending money for refrigerators or to put a furnace in a home or a steam apparatus in a home to satisfy the Johns Manville Co. or the American Radiator Co. or the General Motors Co. and begin putting up some homes. There is a dire need in America today for new homes, and as time goes on there will be more of a need. We can learn a profitable lesson from some of our European countries on the subject of national housing.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Members will adopt the Reilly amendment which will extend the time of this agency until April 1, 1937. Speaking for myself, I think we ought to have a permanent housing act, and I think the time will come soon when we will consider and pass such legislation. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this measure.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. May I say to the gentleman, with reference to the flood situation, that I hope he will support my measure covering flood relief. I understand there is another flood coming on which will have a disastrous effect on Pittsburgh.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I am sure if the Members from New England and Pennsylvania and other States affected would be approached by their constituents, they would be told to vote for legislation and all worth-while measures designed to curb the flood menace so destructive of human life and property.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in my support of this legislation I cannot agree with all the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY]. It seems to me there are only two salient and important phases of this bill.

On January 22, 1936, I introduced a bill known as H. R. 10501, the sole and simple purpose of which was to extend title I to April 1, 1938. I choose this date on the theory that the rehabilitation of the building industry and its return to some form of normalcy required 2 years' time and was necessary to obtain some kind of permanent recovery. I do feel it will take 2 years for the building industry to return to normalcy.

However, this pending bill provides for December 31, 1936, and we know that the Senate bill provides for April 1, 1937. I am willing to accept the Senate bill as to the effective date and the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] designating April 1, 1937.

I take this position, first, on the theory that the new Congress which convenes on January 3, 1937, should have an opportunity for further study of this great problem.

Second, in the history of important legislation it has always been revealed that it takes time and some experience to iron out the difficulties that arise that could not have been anticipated.

What I think is perhaps also more important at this particular time is the other phrase, the provision which comes from the House Committee on Banking and Currency and which is not in the Senate bill, providing for help and assistance and financing of small homes up to the amount of $2,000.

At the time the Senate passed the bill and at the time the Federal Housing Administrator first made his recommendation to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Nation did not have the condition that has arisen by reason of the floods.

This legislation, Mr. Chairman, is not only meritorious but it is something that the Nation needs, and needs badly.

I quite concur in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY] that the building industry was, perhaps, the first to suffer and will be the last to be able to recover.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, these two important points are the only things at issue, and even though mistakes have been made, and even though sufficient time or experience has not yet been had to iron out some of the differences of opinion, I believe the legislation is meritorious and that the bill should be passed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

HOUSING, CONSERVATION, AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill and shall vote for it. It seems to be the opinion of the Members of the House that they are all for it but they are not very well satisfied with it. However, I want to say this about the measure: It is not a housing bill, it is not a slum-clearance bill, and, as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] said, it is not a drop in the bucket. Yet when I asked him how this should be carried out, or how a proper housing program should be started, he evaded answer and seemed worried about my "misapprehensions." I did not ask him to worry about my misapprehensions; I asked him to answer my question, and not in such a suave and sweet way, either. He answered in sweet nothings; a good Republican answer.

AMERICA SHOULD BUILD A MILLION HOMES A YEAR

We are not meeting the problems we have in reference to unemployment. We are not meeting our problems in reference to building and housing. Instead of building 12,000 houses a year, or, rather, guaranteeing them for bankers and taking the losses on them, a comprehensive building program should be established by the Congress of the United States to build, not these 12,000 houses a year but 1,000,000 houses a year. [Applause.]

In England they had a program where they were building something like 400,000 houses a year. They were doing something like 20 or 30 times as much as we were doing, considering the comparative wealth and size of the two countries. England is about the size of the State of Illinois, and yet she is doing much more in this respect than we are doing. Comparatively, what we are doing is infinitesimal.

I repeat, we are not meeting this problem at all, we are just scratching the surface. I may add that the building trades in this country are still off something like 85 percent, and we are not going to have any recovery here until we rehabilitate the building industry. If we once rehabilitate this industry we can then make some move toward prosperity. This bill hardly touches the subject, and all we can say is that we have done slightly better than nothing.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES GOES SIDE BY SIDE WITH HOUSING

There is another subject that goes side by side with this, and that is the matter of conservation of our natural resources. I have introduced a bill on conservation known as the Resources Board bill, H. R. 10303. It is widely endorsed all over the Nation by agricultural, forestry, and conservation organizations and, I believe, has the approval of practically every State planning board. It is not even out of the Public Lands Committee.

Most of the gentlemen on that committee say, "I think it is a pretty good bill, but we do not want to bring it out now." The truth of the matter is that Congress has sort of got the mental staggers. Election day is coming and we are not doing as much as we ought to do.

Getting back to this bill on housing. The only criticism I have is that it does not go far enough. We go ahead and spend $50,000 on investigating the Townsend plan, because some of us are a little scared—and that is all right. I am glad to spend $50,000 looking into the Townsend plan, but why should we not spend $50,000 to go into a constructive, intelligent, and scientific study of the building trades of this country in order to get people back to work?

OUR REAL PROBLEM IS UNEMPLOYMENT

Our problem is one of unemployment. This is the grave national question we must solve, and if we go into an intelligent housing campaign we can put two or three million people to work. We need to build 10 or 15 million houses and not just a few thousand. If we have an effective and substantial building campaign—a million houses a year, or at least 750,000 a year—we know we can then have a period of recovery of at least 10 or 15 years.

Combined with this we should have a definite program of the conservation of natural resources in connection with the C. C. C. camps; we should also have soil conservation, which will also create additional employment. These are the things that concern the fundamental economics of the country; it is all necessary, and must be done if we are to survive as a nation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In my district we had the devastating floods. We must aid and assist these home owners to rebuild their properties. Entire communities have been wiped out, and in one community I am told there is only one house in good shape left standing.

Mr. MAVERICK. I thank the gentleman. It is true, and we should do something about it, because it is a national disaster that concerns the general welfare of us all. Now, the Republicans need not smile at the efforts of the Democrats, for you are not doing anything. [Laughter.] You Republicans have no cause for pride; you have no program, no plan, and apparently no ideas.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks that his time be extended 2 minutes. Is there objection?

WHEREIN IT IS SHOWN REPUBLICANS SHOULD HAVE GLUM FACES

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object if the gentleman does not spend so much time talking about the Republican Party.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. I cannot say all I want to say about the Republicans in 2 minutes. If I recounted their faults it would take too long.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. How in the world can any Republican possibly smile under the New Deal? [Laughter.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Well, I might say that the American people are smiling with the New Deal and are well satisfied. [Applause.] My idea is that the Republicans ought to look serious; in fact, they ought to look sick.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want to say that in West Virginia the partial registration now being taken shows that the Democrats have increased in number. Our citizens appreciate the worth-while program of this administration.

Mr. MAVERICK. Of course; smart people live in the State of West Virginia. [Laughter.] But let me be serious. In any government in the civilized world you are supposed to have an intelligent opposition. We have not got an intelligent opposition in this country. [Laughter and applause.]

Today all the talk I have heard from the Republican side has contained nothing constructive, not a thing. The Republicans have not put forward one single constructive idea; all I have heard is carping and criticism. You have not got any ideas. What do you stand for? As far as I can see, nothing except knocking others down. [Laughter and applause.]

HOUSING SHOULD RECEIVE ATTENTION IN ORDER THAT ALL SHOULD HAVE HOMES

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I want to ask this question. The gentleman has introduced a measure for slum clearance. Will he state what his party is doing to push through that bill for slum clearance?

Mr. MAVERICK. I introduced House Resolution 395, to create a select committee to study the matter of housing.

I wish every Member of the House would get a copy of that resolution, which provides as follows:

The committee is authorized and directed to conduct a constructive, comprehensive investigation, study, and analysis of the problems of urban, suburban, and agricultural housing, slum clearance, and conservation of natural resources of the United States, the existing Federal policies and laws on such subjects, and the agencies of the Federal Government administering such laws, with the view to the development of a sound, coordinated program of Federal activity through the fullest utilization of private and public enterprise in these fields and the preparation of legislative recommendations to carry out such program.

Mr. Chairman, we spend millions on all other subjects, scandalous and otherwise; why not spend a few thousand on something substantial? I am convinced that an intelligent, scientific investigation will lead us to adopt some type of housing program for the masses of the people. If it is not for the masses of the people, it is of no value—and furthermore, if we are to revive the building industry and bring recovery, it must be done through mass employment and mass purchasing power. A few houses built here and there will accomplish nothing. Besides, all of the people are entitled to decent homes.

I might say to the gentleman that it is my understanding that a housing bill will be introduced by the distinguished Senator from New York, ROBERT F. WAGNER, and it is a good one. In the meantime, I urge my colleagues to make an investigation of my resolution for the select committee to study the matter of housing. Vote for this bill; but, I repeat again, it is not enough. We must have a great Nation-wide housing campaign, connected with the conservation of our natural resources. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment. The amendment pending before the Committee and offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] seems to me to be reasonable. In line 10 on page 1 the amendment moves to strike out the words "or private", confining the sale to public sale. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] is going to offer an amendment extending the time within which the bill will operate to April 1 of next year, reserving to the President the right, by Executive order, to discontinue its operation at any prior time should he deem it advisable or necessary. This also seems to be a necessary amendment and one which the Committee should adopt. Neither one of those amendments is harmful to the bill. They are amendments that are not hostile to the bill. They are not offered in an unfriendly way. I hope the Committee will accept them rather than have any controversy about them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] support the bill if his amendment is adopted?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. HANCOCK will speak for himself.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman says that he is favorable to the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not say that. I said that it was an amendment that was not hostile to the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. If the gentleman will permit, I have supported every measure that has been brought in here to further home building.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman support the bill with that amendment?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I will with one or two amendments, and I may even do so if those amendments are not adopted.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from North Carolina is one of the most constructive and able Members of the House.

With reference to the remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], I will say there is a lot of logic in what the gentleman from Texas says. Outside of the remarks he made with reference to the Republican Party, it was a very serious speech. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] asked the gentleman from Texas about slum clearance, a very pertinent question. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that whatever efforts have been made in this country with reference to slum clearance were instituted by the present administration. The gentleman from Texas referred to the effort being made in England. England, of course, has a central government acting through its Parliament, while here we have a dual system of government. We have difficulty in legislating as a result of our dual system of government which we must appreciate and always have in mind. The United States circuit court recently declared unconstitutional certain aspects of the law we passed within the last few years, that part with reference to the right of the Federal Government to exercise the power of eminent domain in connection with slum-clearance projects. I think the United States courts were right. In any event, the Government is not challenging the conclusion of the circuit court which sustained the opinion of the Federal judge in determining that part of the slum-clearance law to be unconstitutional. Necessity compels us to operate through the several States. Recently the high court of New York State declared constitutional a State statute which vested in a commission appointed in the city of New York the right to exercise the power of eminent domain. In Massachusetts we have passed a similar law, and other States undoubtedly have passed or are considering like legislation. There is pending before this Congress legislation to appropriate from three to five hundred million dollars to carry out these purposes.

It is through the police or constitutional powers of the several States that the right to exercise the power of eminent domain exists. What has been done in this country with reference to slum clearance has been done by this administration. I say that in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]. I know the Members realize that slum clearance and slum removal directly concern the public health, and that legislation should pass. There are many unfortunates in this country who are living under such adverse conditions which entitles to such consideration as can be done only through governmental action. The Federal Government has entered into this field, and will continue its efforts to alleviate human distress.

Mr. MAVERICK. The gentleman is perfectly willing to have a law that is constitutional giving the Federal Government this power?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly; but I do not think the Federal Government has the right to exercise the power of eminent domain necessary for successful slum clearance, therefore we must have State cooperation.

Mr. MAVERICK. But the gentleman is in favor of it?

Mr. McCORMACK. Not only in principle but I am in favor of something being done.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], supported by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. In addition to the reasons stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], the administrative difficulties of enforcing collections would be tremendous. The additional expense would be tremendous. That amendment was carefully considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] has indicated, the decision of the committee was almost unanimous against it. There is not any good purpose that can be served by it. There is not any justifiable excuse or reason for it. The rights of the owners of the securities are and can be and will be properly protected without it. We are considering here legislation from a broad standpoint. I hope the House will take the advice of the committee that has studied it, and the advice and recommendations of the Housing Administration that also has studied it. I urge that that amendment be voted down.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that invariably in court proceedings, when it comes to a private sale or a public sale of securities or lands or any property, an advantageous sale can be made privately much better than publicly?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and the interests of the holder protected, and from my personal experience as a lawyer, far more, on the average, can be secured for the administration in collections if this amendment is voted down and private sales allowed.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short statement?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I want to say, in answer to the speeches made here today about slum clearance and low-cost housing, I have a bill before the Committee on Banking and Currency. It has been endorsed by Secretary Ickes and I am hopeful of obtaining hearings before that committee in a short time, and that this Congress will have before it at this session a slum-clearance and low-cost housing program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson] has expired.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, the National Housing Act has been a sort of a pet of mine. I have had some experience before this committee at the last session, when I proposed the amendment for insuring loans up to $50,000. It was my privilege to introduce the first bill extending the life of this section during this session. I understand, and I hope the understanding is correct, that the $50,000 figure contained in the bill and which was stricken out and substituted with the amount of $25,000 will be restored to the original amount. It is my understanding that an amendment will be offered to do that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is the committee amendment. There will not be any amendment offered. The Clerk will read the committee amendment, and those who are opposed to the committee amendment will vote against it, and if the opposition carries, the amount will then be $50,000.

Mr. DINGELL. However, there will be provision for that. That is what I am chiefly interested in.

Another thing that I am concerned about as provided originally in my bill is the extension of the life of this section of the F. H. A. for a period of at least 1 year. It is manifestly clear that it is entirely wrong that this act should terminate at a time when the Congress is not in session. We should be courageous enough, when we learn that the provisions of the act have outworn their usefulness, to refuse to extend the life of the act further, but at any rate the bill should continue until such time as the Congress is again in session. As I have said before, I believe that 40 percent of our unemployed are in the building trades. That is approximately 4,000,000 people. Three million others, or an additional 30 percent, are to be found directly or indirectly in what may be termed "the allied or associated trades and industries." If we can do anything to reduce that number it is manifestly clear we are going a long way toward the reduction of the unemployment and therefore the elimination of the relief rolls.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I would like to ask the committee a question. The amendment reduced it from $50,000 to $25,000. Will the committee ask the House to defeat its amendment and restore the $50,000?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. No. I stated this morning, when that part of the bill is reached I personally would not object to the defeat of the House amendment, but I cannot speak for any member of the committee except myself.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If that is defeated, we will restore the $50,000?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is correct.

Mr. DINGELL. These two questions embody all that I am interested in.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

When we come to consider whether we will vote up or vote down the committee amendment, I believe we ought to weigh carefully what is going on in other countries. Reference was made today to the matter of slum clearances as it is carried on in England. We in America seem to think that we have our own way of doing things, and we are reluctant to adopt any plan or any type other than our own, no matter how valuable it may be to the interest or welfare of our people.

Only a short time ago I was sitting as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, when Mr. Cook, head of the Rural Electrification Administration, appeared there and undertook to show how we in America were far behind other countries in rural electrification. He pointed out how Japan was far and away ahead of us; how Sweden was ahead of us; and England. Then the committee interrupted him and asked him various questions relating to the subject of electrification as applied to the rural sections of this country.

After he had responded at length to the questions of the members of the committee, I asked him whether he wanted to present as an argument in support of the proposed rural electrification bill the fact other countries had advanced in rural electrification far beyond us. He seemed indignant and said he did not want to submit the progress of other countries as an argument in favor of the bill and only mentioned conditions in other countries incidentally.

But we ought to take notice of what is going on in other countries, especially that which would be advantageous to us here. If the Members of Congress have read the headlines of the newspapers yesterday and today, they know of a notable event happening on the other side of the ocean, the great Atlantic. Tomorrow the Irish Sweepstakes will take place. Our people here in the United States to this single event have contributed, according to estimate $20,000,000, but I say far in excess of that. It is now our policy not to lend money to foreign countries; yet yearly we are sending them as a contribution—a gift—upward of $200,000,000, which we ought to keep at home, where, goodness knows, it is needed. The people of America are contributing to the great lotteries of Europe hundreds of millions every year, instead of investing them in a national lottery of our own for the benefit of our own Government and the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does the gentleman think it is a good business gamble when we get back less than 1 percent of what we send over?

Mr. KENNEY. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. McFARLANE. Then why does the gentleman advocate it so often on the floor of Congress?

Mr. KENNEY. Because I want to keep hundreds of millions of dollars at home. I want these and the proceeds of domestic lotteries to help relieve unemployment, to support old-age pensions, and to protect the American public, which contributes altogether from three to six billions a year in lotteries, many of them dishonest. Participation by our people in an honest lottery conducted under Federal auspices would reap a huge revenue for the Government and curtail taxation, which would make for better business and the solution of some of our problems, including the unemployment problem. The bill before the House will tend to increase employment. The passage of my lottery bill would result in the employment of many men and women, as has been proven in other countries.

No one seriously dotes on a return on his investment. When we contribute to the Red Cross we hardly consider it as a business investment. So participation in a governmental lottery would be a gift to our Government and to ourselves.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line.

Mr. Chairman, at the time I asked the question of the gentleman from Texas with reference to a genuine slum-clearance program it was not my purpose or intention at all to interject any party politics. Everyone knows that I have at no time during my short term here interjected party politics either with regard to my vote or to any speech I have made on the floor of the House. I think the time has come, however, when the Democratic majority must face its obligations, and the reason I pick on the Democrats is because they are in the majority and the responsibility is theirs, and also because I believe I cannot receive much support for my views from members of my own party; I repeat, the reason I pick on the Democrats is because the responsibility is theirs. It seems to me the Democratic Party, up to the present time, has just been shadow boxing with the fundamental problems confronting this Nation. As a matter of fact, the New Deal has been retreating. It has retreated on the question of unemployment relief. While it advocated $4,800,000,000 for unemployment relief for the fiscal year 1936, it is now advocating only $1,500,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937, despite the fact that the unemployment situation is the same; and this at a time when, according to the conservative figures of the American Federation of Labor, 12,660,000 are out of employment.

As for slum clearance, you just talk about it; you have not done a single, solitary thing toward genuine slum clearance in the United States. In the one or two instances where you attempted slum clearance you simply drove out the poor class of tenants who could not afford to pay more than $5 a room a month, and built in the place of what you tore down, buildings which now rent for $10, $15, and $20 a room a month. The result is, you have forced the poor tenants, for whose benefit slum-clearance appropriations should be made, from the quarters they occupied, and in the name of slum clearance you have erected more-costly buildings, used and inhabited by the class that can pay $10, $15, and $20 a room. Do you call that program a slum-clearance program? It is a profit-making scheme for a chosen few. Why not quit demagoging and appropriate funds to give American workers decent buildings in which to live, at rents which they can afford to pay?

In the final analysis the Democratic Party, the majority party, which today has the leadership, should fight the Liberty League by deed and not merely by making faces at it. Instead, it just talks a good fight and always surrenders. You have failed the workingmen and women of this country and, as far as the unemployed are concerned, you have substituted in the place and stead of the fantastic Hoover myth of two chickens in every pot, the stark reality of two wolves at every door. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I thank the gentleman for his explanation of the slum-clearance work. If in the first place the fact be as the gentleman stated, that we Republicans lack ideas, do you Democrats object if we borrow the ideas incorporated in your platform of 1932?

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment, for the purpose of making an observation and asking a question of some member of the committee.

I had this experience last fall in my home city: The housing authority held a meeting in the high school there and invited the public to hear an explanation of the proposition. This was all right, and I participated in the meeting. What I say now is not in criticism of the Housing Administration, but after the proposition was thoroughly explained and the people were quite enthusiastic and wanted to participate in its benefits, it appeared the restrictions did not permit of very much business, and I mention one instance: A young man in my city owns a building lot in a very good part of the city. He is in business and has a good job and has ability to repay the loan and all the charges. He is a young married man of fine character, well-liked in the community, and, if banking credit was normal, I should say he would be able to get the money at the bank. He made application for a loan through the Federal Housing Administration. He was not successful in securing the loan, because, as they said, the lot was not in restricted territory. Now, if a loan cannot be made to build a house on anything but restricted territory, I do not see how the people in my district can get very much benefit under this act, because there is very little restricted property in my city or in any city.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think sufficient answer to the gentleman's observation is the statement that the restricted-territory regulations apply under title II of this act.

Mr. FIESINGER. Is that the section dealing with building new houses?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That only applies to title II, and has no relation to the title we are now considering.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 1, after line 4, strike out after the word "compensation", in the second sentence of section 1 of title I, the rest of the sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following: "said officers and employees to be appointed in accordance with the civil-service laws and rules thereunder and their compensation fixed as provided in the Classification Act of 1923, as amended", and in the third sentence of said section 1 strike out the words "without regard to any other provisions of law governing the expenditure of public funds."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment that it is not germane. It is new matter entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule, if the bill was confined to one particular amendment there might be some question as to the germaneness of my amendment. But this bill attempts to amend existing law in several particulars. It amends section 1 of title I and it amends section 2 of title I.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, the matter desired to be inserted by the gentleman from Michigan does not refer in any way to the subject matter of the legislation. It has no possible reference to the subject matter of the legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Section 1 of this bill deals with the sale and handling of securities.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the Chairman, but section 1 of the law relates to appointment of employees and the fixing of their compensation, which is the section I am trying to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read a syllabus from a decision made by Mr. Speaker Gillett:

To a bill amendatory of an act in several particulars an amendment proposing to modify the act, but not relating to the bill, was held not to be germane (Cannon's Precedents, sec. 2947).

It seems very clear to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan does attempt to modify a section of the existing law, but it is not germane to this particular section of the bill. The point of order, therefore, is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 2 of title I is amended, effective on and after April 1, 1936, to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. The Administrator is authorized and empowered, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to insure banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building-and-loan associations, installment lending companies, and other such financial institutions, which the Administrator finds to be qualified by experience or facilities as eligible for credit insurance, against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit not in excess of $2,000, and purchases of obligations representing such loans and advances of credit, made by them on and after April 1, 1936, and prior to December 31, 1936, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and additions upon improved real property by the owners thereof or lessees of such real property under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of the loan, and against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit, not in excess of $50,000, and purchases of obligations representing such loans and advances of credit, made during such period to owners of real property already improved by apartment or multiple-family houses, hotels, office, business, or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, or manufacturing or industrial plants, or improved by some other structure which is to be converted into one of the above-mentioned types of structure, or to lessees thereof under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of the loan, for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and additions to such real property, and the purchase and installation of equipment and machinery thereon.

"In no case shall the insurance granted by the Administrator under this section to any such financial institution on loans, advances of credit, and purchases made by such financial institutions for such purposes after April 1, 1936, exceed 10 percent of the total amount of such loans, advances of credit, and purchases. The total liability incurred by the Administrator for all insurance granted under this section, including all insurance heretofore and hereafter granted, shall not exceed in the aggregate of $100,000,000. No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions, as the Administrator shall prescribe in order to make credit available for the purposes of this title.

"The Administrator is authorized and empowered to transfer, under such regulations as he may prescribe, any insurance in connection with any loans and advances of credit which may be sold by one approved financial institution to another approved financial institution."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 24, strike out "additions upon improved" and insert "improvements upon."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

On page 3, line 4, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$25,000."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is the matter about which I spoke previously in presenting the rule. Last year the committee and the House inserted a provision for $50,000 to cover alterations and repair of tenements, apartments, and so forth. The Senate bill contains the $50,000. The Federal Housing Administration, I understand, is in favor of the $50,000. This committee, by a majority, offers an amendment to reduce this to $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] said in one respect is not far from the fact. The whole slum-clearance problem and low-cost housing under the R. F. C., the P. W. A., and Federal Housing Act has been substantially a complete failure. There has been no sentiment in their administrations for it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] blames it on the Democratic Party.

From my experience, which has been quite extensive with it, the blame lies at the doorstep of the Republican administrators who are administering the law—appointed, unfortunately, by a Democratic administration. They are practically all Republicans who have had charge of these matters, and they have no sympathy with low-cost housing or slum clearance.

This opportunity being gone—and I do not believe you will ever get any low-cost housing—this provision was put in here to meet, to some extent, the conditions in the cities and to remodel and modernize tenements and apartments, so that a decent place in which to live might be furnished at a much lower rent than the low-cost housing.

As the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] has said, where they have financed or developed low-cost housing, just to make a showing, the rents run from $10 to $15 a room, whereas if this provision is afforded, not alone to my city but to every city in the country, we can remodel tenements and apartments and give as good quarters at from $5 to $7 a room. This is why we want to preserve this limitation of $50,000.

I believe the committee is not definitely in favor of the $25,000, and I believe they would be content if the limitation of $50,000 were permitted to remain.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The $50,000 limitation is particularly necessary now on account of the destruction caused by the floodwaters in the various cities.

Mr. O'CONNOR. More so than ever; yes.

This bill would probably not be here if it were not for the flood condition, and I may say that the limitation of $2,000 on houses is here principally to furnish some relief in the flood areas, and the new provision in the bill allowing construction on unimproved real estate is here solely on account of such condition.

I hope the committee amendment will be voted down and the provision of the bill as it was last year and as it passed the Senate and as nearly a majority of the committee wish it to be, providing a limitation of $50,000, will be retained.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman spoke about these administrators being Republicans; they were appointed by the President and are subject to removal by the President?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; that is the fact.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In regard to this measure I want the Members of the House from the cities of the country to understand and know that the Representatives from the farming sections of the United States are not entirely ignorant of the fact that the cities need help, and anything we can contribute to the relief of people who live in large tenement houses, I am sure, will be done, and the farm people will support us in anything we may do in the Congress to this end.

There is only one danger in legislation of this kind, and that is we give too much blanket authority to someone. We have discovered this in respect of the seed situation in North Dakota. We have discovered that the seed situation is being handled by the Resettlement Administration; and before a farmer can get seed he must show he is absolutely no good financially, and after showing this by an application as long as an income-tax report he must conclude by showing the Government that in a period of 5 years he will be all right financially and will pay everybody. The result is that about 15,000 worthy farmers in North Dakota cannot get seed unless we can get the Resettlement rules changed.

This situation applies to all of the Northwest or North Central States. We must have seed now. May 1 will be too late.

This situation arises, I think, because Congress delegates blanket authority to these institutions without hemming in such organizations and administrations with more direct instructions from Congress. I think it is our own fault as much as the fault of anyone else that we do not take time enough to go into the administrative end of these measures instead of just handing the matter over to them, which is the easy thing to do.

I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, I am mighty glad to support the suggestion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] to vote down the committee amendment and leave the bill as it is. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I shall not take the 5 minutes.

I shall only impose upon the patience of the Committee a couple of minutes. I think a little history of this legislation might not do us any harm. I am speaking in favor of the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and I want to remind the House that in 1934, when the Housing bill came up, many of the vital provisions of the bill were then opposed by many gentlemen who, in fairness, have now come around are favoring the legislation. Had it not been for the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], we could not have restored, as we did upon the floor of the House, some of the vital provisions of the bill which are benefiting the employment situation today.

We had the same situation last year. At that time this committee came in with this $25,000 limitation. We restored the amount to $50,000 on the floor, to no small extent through the influence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

I do not know how many loans will be made or how much improvement will be carried on by reason of having the limitation at $50,000 rather than $25,000, but it cannot do any harm, as the losses under it have been and our experience shows will be inconsiderable.

Furthermore, the instances that I have just cited as to the prominent part taken in passing this legislation by the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. O'CONNOR] and the study that he has so evidently given to the needs of the great city of New York and the needs of his own congressional district, entitle him to have his opinion given some weight and his wishes respected. I know during my 4 years of service here I have found that my distinguished colleague from New York has always looked at things from a national point of view and has always been willing to further legislation for the interests of agriculture and for all sections of the country. It is no more than fair that the needs of his congressional district and his city should be given consideration in this legislation, as he requests. He has earned the right to demand it. [Applause.]

I recall also that the very able gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], when we had legislation perfecting and amendatory to the Housing Act before us last year, had, with remarkable industry, collected a large amount of data and information for the uses of the committee and of the House. He was the author of one of these amendments to carry out this same purpose. He appeared before our committee on several occasions on this subject and gave us valuable support in securing its passage by the House. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman knows that many members of our committee, not a majority, favored putting the figure at $50,000.

Mr. SISSON. That is a correct statement.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And the bill, containing the $50,000 limit, passed the Senate yesterday.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 9, after the word "schools", insert "churches."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 3, line 16, strike out "an" and insert the word "and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I send two amendments to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 22, strike out the figures "10" and insert the figure "5."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the other amendment should be reported first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: Page 2, line 25, insert before the word "improvements" the word "structural."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, it was the judgment of our committee that under title I as amended, no further loans for electrical appliances and miscellaneous household articles would be eligible under the language of section 2 as amended. The Administrator told the committee that in view of the fact that the Electric Home and Farm Authority and the Rural Electrification Administration were dealing in the financing of appliances of this kind that they were willing to withdraw from this field of activity. Now if you want to encourage the real building trades in this country this amendment offers that opportunity. This amendment means that hereafter the improvements must be of a structural character. That, I know, was what we wanted title I to do in the original act. It was a major objective. It was one of its attractive features.

We know that under the present operations of the Housing Administration more than 54 percent of the loans in amount already insured have been loans for electrical appliances, plumbing and heating fixtures, and other mechanical equipment.

This amendment does not apply to loans insured under the $50,000 limitation. It only means that improvements that are to be made under $2,000 loans shall be real useful and needed improvements to small-home owners who have been almost forgotten by the Federal Housing Administrator. This phase of the program was its heart. All of us know that due to the depression there were literally thousands upon thousands of small-home owners who had been forced to neglect their homes; that this condition obtained throughout the breadth and length of the land; that through the operations of title I these worthy people would have a chance to get the money on their character notes and put their homes back in livable and decent condition for their families. Aside from the economic considerations involved, it was pregnant with social advantages. What could have been a more worthy governmental objective?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Would the insertion of the word "structural" prevent loans for painting houses?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Is not painting an important improvement upon real estate?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is an important improvement, but usually not so important as a structural improvement.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. If the language is left as it is, it will allow both.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The words "repairs and alterations" are broad enough to include painting or any other improvement of this character. Here is my purpose in offering this amendment. Of course, if somebody can offer one which is more clarifying, I would be delighted to support it. Under the present language, I am confident that the Federal Housing Administration can continue to insure loans covering the sale of electrical appliances, and so forth, because the present language is identical with the language of the original act. Unless some change in the language like this proposed is made, it means that financing of these loans can be carried on. Here is the only difference that I can see: From now on the borrower must own an interest in real estate or his lease must run for 6 years beyond the time of the maturity of the loan insured. Heretofore anybody, anywhere, if I am correctly advised, could buy this stuff and was eligible as a partner with the Government. Employment or improvements on real estate was a secondary consideration. Volume of sales by the manufacturers was the first thought and consideration of the F. H. A. officials.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The original act of 1934 was passed in June 1934, and it did not permit loans on electrical equipment. On August 25 we amended and inserted the words "including equipment and machinery."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I understand the gentleman is advising me what Congress has done, but the gentleman should know well that before the amendment to which he refers was enacted, loans had been insured on the sale of electrical appliances. All he has to do is to look at the report. There is no doubt in the world about that. My friend has evidently never carefully read the hearings or a single report of this agency. It all centers on the question of the interpretation of what is meant by improvements on or to real estate or real property. Here is the question: Would the installation of a Frigidaire or a radio, both, of course, useful articles, or a cream whipper be such an improvement to real property? You have got to spell out its meaning if you do not want the Federal Housing Administration to continue using this insurance fund to stimulate the business of these favorite clients. I recognize that many of these articles are useful to home owners, but I am convinced that they are available to anybody on reasonable terms without the Government subsidy which is going to assist manufacturers who are amply able to take care of their own sales. These are not character loans for renovizing or modernization of homes. They are anything else. If you want to stop it, adopt the amendment I am offering. If you do not, vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment which I offer and which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: Page 3, line 22, strike out the figure "10" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "5."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps the last time I shall appear before the Committee with reference to this bill. I believe the discussion has been helpful in giving the membership a picture of Federal Housing activities to date. I certainly hope it has. The amendment I am now offering would limit the amount of the Government guaranty to the lending institution to 5 percent of their total loans made from the date of this amendment rather than 10 percent as provided on page 3 of the bill. It would work in this way: They draw 9½ percent interest plus on the loans which they make. As I have pointed out heretofore, they are also permitted under the regulations of the Federal Housing Administration to charge, in addition, a 5-percent penalty for defaults where there has been a delay of 15 days. Remember all of this falls on the borrower. He pays the freight. In other words, if an approved institution from now on made loans of $100,000 in the aggregate, the Federal Government would only be responsible for $5,000 of their losses. Is not that fair? Is it not enough as an inducement on paper of this kind and especially since they require security in the form of a lien on the articles? What consideration, if any, is shown toward the borrower or old Uncle Sam?

Approximately $60,000,000 of the $100,000,000 which can be used for this purpose has been set aside as an insurance reserve to cover the liability of the Federal Government on the $300,000,000 of loans insured up to date. Therefore, there is left about $40,000,000. That means that the Federal Housing Administration can insure approximately $400,000,000 additional in loans under this title. If you reduce the amount of the guaranty from 10 to 5 percent you thereby automatically increase the amount of business they can do from this time on from $400,000,000 to $800,000,000.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is it not a fact that if that amendment is carried through they cannot make any loans, because they will not loan money with a 5-percent guaranty? Is that not true?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I cannot follow your logic or reasoning. We cannot continue indefinitely to coax and wet-nurse them. Many of them do not want it. They know it is largely a hand-out. I imagine that today, with loans being made by banks to the Farm, Home, and Electric Authority, as was developed yesterday, at three-quarters of 1 percent, and on cotton and other commodities at 1 percent, and with their vaults bulging over with cash, a 5-percent guaranty on loans of this kind, which carry an interest rate of 9½ percent, plus a charge of 5 percent for defaults, ought to be very attractive. Who else is being accorded such favorite treatment? If the loans were purely "character loans" for true modernization of homes, a 10-percent guaranty might be justified.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from North Carolina is opposed to this particular provision and was opposed to this particular provision and would defeat it if he could, if it was 10 percent or 20 percent or 5 percent?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. No. I am perfectly willing to go along if it is reduced to 5 percent; but whether I go along or not, it will probably not make any serious difference. I have tried to make my position clear, for I am anxious to see this agency operate for the welfare of all the people. I fully appreciate my limited influence, and especially when instructions have been handed down. I know, though, I am doing my duty and this makes me peacefully happy. But I say, whether you adopt this amendment or not, I shall vote for this bill, because, notwithstanding the fact that I have not been able to eliminate the known evils and abuses, I still believe there is some good left in the Federal Housing Administration.

In presenting my arguments on the bill and the agency I have tried to be fair. My deductions can be confirmed by the records which I have studied for several days and nights.

I wish to say with respect to the criticisms that have been directed toward me—and I reply not in the spirit of controversy but in the most friendly attitude possible—that some of the statements that have been made, especially the statements made by the distinguished acting chairman, the gentleman from Maryland, a while ago, when he pointed to another one of my exaggerations, was but an attempt to evade rather than puncture my contentions.

Some of the facts which I have developed took him by surprise. He evidently had not kept up with what was going on "Federal Housingly." I invite a correction or contradiction of any statement of fact or charge that I have made. In bringing out these facts—all true, based on the records—I have tried my best to help the American people and save the taxpayers all the money I could. I also want to say, as a parting statement, that the RECORD will show that my attitude toward the Federal Housing Administration has always been as fair, cooperatively, and kindly, as the attitude of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], the acting chairman. I hope sincerely the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Let me say regarding the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] that we who have worked with him for 4 years on the Committee on Banking and Currency fully appreciate his deep interest in this legislation. We look upon him as one of the leading authorities in our committee upon this subject. He has devoted himself most assiduously to obtaining a thorough knowledge of all of these matters connected with the various activities of Federal housing. No one admires him more than does the man who is now speaking, for his absolute sincerity and thorough knowledge of the subject.

We have guaranteed the accounts of persons investing in building-and-loan associations up to the amount of $5,000 and have done so to the extent of 100 percent of that amount. The gentleman from North Carolina has been most assiduous in his efforts to bring that about, and he is largely to be credited with it. There are a great many of us from States like Michigan and other Midwestern States who are not affected to any extent by the building-and-loan associations. They are not a factor with us. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is passed, it means that those States where building-and-loan associations do not exist or do not do very much business, are not going to get any benefit out of this bill. There is no question in my mind that if this 5-percent amendment is agreed to by the Committee of the Whole, it means an end to this legislation. If you want this legislation, you will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN to the amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 3, in line 22, strike out "5" and insert "20."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks this morning I quoted this change in the bill as indictment no. 4 against the bill, because you know and I know that no financial institution will accept these loans if they are only insured even up to 10 percent, whereas the gentleman from North Carolina brings in an amendment to reduce it to 5 percent.

As has been well stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], it simply means to kill the bill. All I am doing is to put in the language of the existing law permitting the insurance of loans up to 20 percent. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, but 5 percent can be insured, which means there will be practically no loans accepted at all.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman from Michigan has just stated that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina would kill the bill. If this be so, then the 20-percent amendment of the gentleman from New York will make it a 100-percent better bill; is this right?

Mr. BOYLAN. Absolutely; and it continues the present law. Surely, if we should do anything, we should liberalize it, not only make it 20 percent but even go to 33½ percent or 40 percent, and not try to reduce the thing to a practical nonentity; for no financial institution would accept these loans if they were covered only up to 5 percent.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Members of the Committee to support my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members of the Committee to defeat both these amendments and stand by what the committee has reported. There is a very logical reason for this. The present act, it is true, insures up to 20 percent of the portfolio of an approved lending institution. To state it more clearly, this does not mean that 20 percent of each individual loan is insured; it is insurance of 20 percent of all the loans that may be made. In other words, if there are a lot of cats and dogs left in the hands of the bank or other institutions which made the loan, the Government takes 100 percent loss on them if it does not exceed 20 percent of the loans of that institution. For this reason there is certainly good reason to cut down, as this whole operation of the Housing Administration is being curtailed. There is thus every reason to cut down from 20 percent to 10 percent.

It is true, on the other hand, that if we cut down too far, whatever inducement there may be in the insurance feature disappears. In other words, the bank or other lending institution, in order to qualify and in order to proceed under the Housing Act, has to comply with certain conditions and has to put on, perhaps, an extra clerk, or in the case of large institutions, several clerks, and there is, therefore, some trouble and expense in connection with it. They are willing to do this, however, to get a certain amount of insurance. If we cut down the insurance too far, the incentive disappears. Thus the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to reduce the insurance to 5 percent would practically end the matter.

On the other hand we have an agency which has been set up and operating for a considerable length of time appearing before our committee and saying that in their opinion the work has been pretty well done, and that it is time to curtail and to taper off. They, therefore, ask that the insurance be cut to 10 percent on the theory that there will thus be fewer cats and dogs left in the hands of the insured institutions and, therefore, less loss to the Government. It does seem to me we ought to go along with the Housing Administration. I ask, therefore, that these amendments be defeated and the bill left as reported by the committee.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Is it not a fact also that this $40,000,000 with a 10-percent insurance feature would serve as a guaranty for $400,000,000 of loans?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Whereas if it is made 20 percent it will serve to insure not more than $20,000,000 of loans.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAMNECK. My point of order is that all time for debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, as all time has been exhausted on the pending amendments.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order, as his amendment would be an amendment in the third degree.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOYLAN) there were—ayes 14, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REILLY: On page 2, in line 20, strike out "December 31, 1936" and insert "April 1, 1937."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania: On page 2, line 17, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment with the most serious intentions and hope it will be considered as such by the Committee, and not merely for the sake of something to do, or in order uselessly to consume the time of this body. Under section 2, the Administrator is authorized and empowered to insure against losses which the lending companies may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit not in excess of $2,000.

The point is, that if any home repair or construction repair work is started or permitted by reason of this act, or any other act, or if for any reason there is a business impetus in the country, there will undoubtedly be a natural increase in material costs and an increase in labor costs, particularly in the sections where such work is required.

While the $2,000 limitation on loans may have been tolerably sufficient when there was only a general business, financial, and employment stagnation, that limit of $2,000 is intolerably insufficient in the face of a gigantic physical demoralism such as those of us have who represent districts devastated by the ravages of the recent unimagined and unexpected floods.

If this specific bill, which, it is said, is intended to help the unfortunate victims of the recent floods, has any practical application to the purpose of its design, if it is to prove of any value to those people, and if they are going to take advantage of its provisions, it is very evident that very substantial amounts of repair and improvement work will be undertaken. Plainly, that will cause increased demand for the required materials and labor, and thus will be stimulated the prices and costs of both material and labor.

In circumstances such as that it would be manifestly insufficient to limit loans that may be insured to $2,000. Many of the best and most comfortable private dwellings in flooded cities and towns have been all but destroyed, and to increase the loan limit to from $2,000 to $5,000 would be a sane and proper provision.

Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the gentleman from New York, the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, was correct when he said that this bill was intended to reach out to the help of the people who have suffered by reason of the overflow of rivers and to relieve the flooded areas. That may, it is true, be the intent, but as a practicable measure, it is to be doubted if it will have even the least beneficial effect. For some of the cities in the district I represent, I am sure it will mean next to nothing.

In the first place, I do not believe that anyone in that district, with few exceptions—and they do not need the provisions of this bill—can pay any such rate of interest as has been stated here this afternoon is being charged under the national housing loans. The situation of thousands of unfortunate people is much too desperate to carry any such a burdensome charge as is being exacted.

If the act is to have any helpful application to those who need whatever beneficence it offers, then it should be made a reality and not a shadow. When the act was passed in 1934, the $2,000 figure, considering everything, may have been satisfactory, but it is plain to me that it should be more than doubled now. An absolute minimum is in my opinion the sum of $5,000. The difference in costs of material and labor and rates, in the event of any impetus to building or repair or reconstruction, makes it imperative these loans should be greater than the amount contained in this bill.

Mr. FORD of California. Title II takes care of that matter.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I do not see how it can when the amount is limited in this section 2. I am talking about repairs to buildings, not new construction. Take Johnstown, where the first floors, and possibly the second and third floors, of many residences have been ruined. The windows are out, the porches are gone, the steps are destroyed, the floors are ruined, and all that sort of thing. On some of the main streets where the residences and homes are of considerable value, $2,000 will not even begin to cover the loss. That is, it will not begin to pay the cost involved in re-improving or reconstructing the property.

Mr. Chairman, the money to rehabilitate will have to come out of some governmental agency for those people, because the banks or lending agencies in the communities no longer possess the necessary capital. The money will have to come out of the Federal Government or through some agency of the Federal Government. I am deadly serious about this amendment, because I feel that the $2,000 limitation on loans is grossly and ridiculously insufficient.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That only referred to one-family houses. On apartments and tenements they can lend as high as $50,000.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am talking about the houses on the streets which people live in; just one-family houses, possibly two-family houses. Here is the situation which confronts us and there is no other way about it. Many comfortable, fairly commodious, and extra good dwellings, in which the owner lives or rented to some other family in whole or in part, were encumbered with obligations, mortgages, or judgments of one kind or another. Taxes, both current and delinquent, stand charged against these buildings and the ground on which they are built. The owners are homeless, and without finances even to begin to re-furnish their homes. The municipal authorities will not be able to collect; the school districts will not be able to collect from them. The very best that the authorities can do is to eventually take over the properties to liquidate the tax liens, and then what becomes of the encumbrance holder, the bank, the trust company, or whatever agency has lent money on the property. What further becomes of the homeless home owners?

This is a deadly serious business and demands every ounce of competent statesmanship that is in Washington. Unless you intend to pay no heed to the distress of hundreds of thousands—and God forbid that anyone should think of us in that light—this Congress must devise ways and means not to shadow-box with this terrible reality of suffering but to come face to face with it in all its miserable results; those most direct and appalling, and as well, those more distant and indirect but nevertheless monumentally disastrous, and overcome them all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, I have all the sympathy in the world for the purposes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY]; nevertheless his amendment would entirely destroy the philosophy of this legislation. When we passed this act in 1934—and I think this is a fair statement—it was not the intention of the Congress to in any way finance the construction of new dwellings under title I. Title II was enacted for that purpose.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will in a moment, if I have time. I want to finish my statement.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I want to correct the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SISSON. I do not yield.

Mr. Chairman, it was found that through an inadvertence title I did allow the construction of $2,000 houses, and loans made for that purpose were character loans. There is no security behind them except the character of the borrower and the insurance. The Government, through the F. H. A., insures those under the present law up to 20 percent, which we are reducing now to 10 percent; but that 10 percent may mean even the payment of 100 percent of a given loan, as has been explained by other members of the committee. We were disposed, I think, to eliminate that, and so amended the present act as to eliminate from title I that construction.

The House bill retains this provision. The Senate bill does not, but struck it out. After considerable discussion in the House Banking and Currency Committee, we retained it in the committee largely out of consideration for the flood sufferers, so that this provision might be used to enable them to build their small homes or bungalows or shacks, although this is not a flood-relief bill. The F. H. A. has been advising bankers at this time in the restricted districts affected by the flood what may be done under the law as it will probably be. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] increasing this to $5,000 throws the whole bill out of joint. It destroys its philosophy. It is contrary to the recommendations of the F. H. A. It is contrary to the result of the careful consideration of the committee. Where they have to have $5,000 or more, this may be taken care of under the provisions of title II.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Committee to reject this amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I tried to obtain the floor after my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] got through, because I felt the gentleman unconsciously had made remarks which showed a misunderstanding of the position of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK]. I say "unconsciously" because I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Michigan, but after eulogizing the gentleman from North Carolina, for whom I have profound respect—whether I agree with him or not on any amendment he may offer I have profound respect for the gentleman and for his sincerity—the gentleman from Michigan closed by saying that the gentleman from North Carolina is trying to kill the bill, although the gentleman from North Carolina just prior thereto had stated that if his amendments were defeated he was going to vote for the bill.

Anything the gentleman from North Carolina states I will accept, and he has stated that he intends to vote for the bill. My friend from Michigan, Mr. BROWN, I am sure did not hear the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina that he intended to vote for the bill.

On the other side my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] opposed the amendment. He took issue with the gentleman from North Carolina, and in a manner which showed that he did not misunderstand his position. He took issue with the gentleman, as he had the right to do, and I supported him and the committee in the position that they took.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I did not hear the gentleman from North Carolina say he was going to vote for the bill. I understood him to say that he might vote for the bill. There is certainly nothing wrong in a gentleman opposing a bill. I have frequently done so, and I hope no one has questioned my motives, and I certainly do not question his.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from North Carolina had just previously stated that if his last amendment was defeated he was going to vote for the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. And I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts there is no one here who has greater respect for the gentleman from North Carolina than I have, but—

Mr. McCORMACK. I have no doubt about that.

The gentleman from North Carolina is one of the most constructive and valuable Members of the House. I am glad that this situation has been cleared up.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "property", insert "and the purchase and installation of equipment and machinery upon such real property."

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section and all amendments thereto is to be closed in 5 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, this amendment was rejected in committee by a close vote. Under the bill as reported the present policy of the Federal Housing Administration will be changed. They now insure loans made to finance the purchase of electrical and other household equipment. If the bill as reported by the committee becomes a law, that will be changed. As it stands now, they can finance this kind of purchase. As the bill passed the Senate yesterday, it contains language similar to my amendment, and I think the House ought to vote on this proposition, so when the bill goes to conference the conferees will know what the attitude of the House is.

Now, I want to say that the losses we have been talking about in connection with the insurance feature of the bill are so small that they can be characterized as infinitesimal. They are only three-tenths of 1 percent of the total amount of business done under the Federal Housing Administration. There was something like $850,000 losses out of approximately $312,000,000 business.

If the amendment is adopted, it means that F. H. A. can no longer finance the purchase of electrical appliances, washing machines, and other household appliances of that kind.

Mr. FORD of California. If the gentleman will yield, I should like to ask him how it is possible to modernize a house if you cannot have electrical appliances?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, the time for debate having been fixed, there is very little opportunity to say much, but the committee deliberately cut this out, respecting electrical equipment, upon the theory that the bill which was passed yesterday covered that ground and it is not necessary.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. How are you going to do anything for the people in the flooded areas if you cut that off? I hope my colleagues will vote for this amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. How is it expected to do anything for the housewives of America unless these labor-saving appliances be permitted to be insured under the act?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWN of Michigan) there were—ayes 45, noes 52.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLENBOGEN: Page 3, line 16, after the word "of", insert "fixtures."

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 3 of title I is hereby repealed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the Committee. This bill is being considered under a rule, to expedite its passage. The House bill and a similar Senate bill were introduced on the same day. Senate bill 4212 is on the Speaker's table. We are now considering the House bill. The titles of the two bills are identical. If it is desired to expedite this legislation, then I urge the Committee, when we go into the House, that they request that Senate bill 4212 be taken from the Speaker's table, that all after the enacting clause be stricken out, and that the language we have just adopted in the Committee in the House bill be substituted for the language of the Senate bill, and that the Senate bill be then passed. Then the bill will go back to the Senate, and if the Senate does not agree to the amendments the bill can immediately be sent to conference. If that be not done, then the House bill, 11689, which we have been considering, must go to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate and be considered there and reported out before the Senate can consider it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is my purpose to ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEAL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11689, and pursuant to House Resolution 465 he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill S. 4212, and that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and the House bill H. R. 11689, as amended, be substituted for the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4212, and that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and the House bill, as amended, be substituted therefor. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "To amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their own remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am happy, indeed, to have the privilege of voting to extend title I of the National Housing Act, as amended, to April 1, 1937, to provide insurance of loans and advances for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and improvements of homes and other real property.

Mr. Speaker, I was one of a small group of House Members who called upon President Roosevelt in the spring of 1934 and started the movement for the enactment by Congress of the original Federal Housing Act. Our group which conferred at the White House with the President consisted of Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio; Mr. SWEENEY, of Ohio; Mr. HEALEY, of Massachusetts; Mr. MEAD, of New York; and myself, and we also conferred with Hon. Jesse Jones, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and other officials of the Federal Government. I consider that the legislation which was subsequently introduced and sponsored by the Banking and Currency Committee and passed by the House and Senate and approved by the President, has justified all the anticipations as to benefits to workers and manufacturers expressed by Mr. Spencer D. Baldwin, president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association, Washington, D. C., bearing date of June 18, 1934, and reading as follows:

NATIONAL RETAIL LUMBER DEALERS ASSOCIATION, Washington, D. C., June 18, 1934.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: On behalf of this organization, and the Western Retail Lumbermen's Association, we desire to thank you for the excellent and effective work you did in cooperation with these and other national organizations, including the American Federation of Labor in the early stages and through to the finish to secure the enactment of the National Housing Act.

Your assistance in promoting a congressional delegation to call upon the President of the United States and the manner in which the problems of the building industry and labor was presented was instrumental in securing his active interest. It is significant that on the day you called upon him, March 20, he issued the Executive order to prepare a complete program for legislative action.

Your willingness at all times and the unselfish manner with which you cooperated certainly merits the approval and support of all who are affected by this legislation.

With kindest personal regards, and best wishes for your continued success, I remain

Very sincerely yours,

SPENCER D. BALDWIN, President.

The repair and remodeling features of the Federal Housing Act have been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, to the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries, and to manufacturers generally. Insurance on loans up to $2,000 for new construction is likewise highly beneficial to both labor and industry. I have taken a keen interest and active part in promoting this legislation to extend the act to April 1, 1937, and have received the following letters from the Federal Housing Administration, to wit:

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, February 11, 1936.

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We were very pleased to have you visit us yesterday and discuss with us the advisability of continuing title I of the National Housing Act which expires on April 1. In accordance with your recommendation, as well as those of other Members of Congress, we have decided to ask for an extension of title I of the act from April 1 to December 31 of this year.

Many of the banks and other lending institutions in your State have taken advantage of this section of the act, which provides for the lending institutions making loans for the purpose of modernization, repair, and additions to dwellings on the basis whereby the Government insures the lending institution against losses up to 20 percent of the total amount of money they lend.

This plan has made it possible for owners of property to make much-needed repairs, and has stimulated considerable activity in the lumber industry and has reemployed many thousands of workmen.

We expect that our amendment will be introduced in Congress within a week's time, and I will let you know the exact time of its introduction so that you may lend your influence in having it enacted.

Very truly yours,

W. D. FLANDERS,
Deputy Administrator.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, March 11, 1936.

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: In accordance with our conversation, I am attaching a copy of Senate bill 4212, relating to the proposed amendment to title I of the National Housing Act.

Very truly yours,

W. D. FLANDERS,
Deputy Administrator.

P. S.—This bill is identical with H. R. 11689.

MR. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country to costly errors that are being made by the various relief organizations of the Government, set up for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this Congress in voting unprecedented relief appropriations.

First, let me say that this Congress passed a bill to provide $50,000,000 for feed and seed for needy farmers of the Nation. This act was vetoed by the President on the assumption that the appropriation was not needed. The President then allocated $30,000,000 from other funds for this purpose, and word went out to the Northwest that funds would immediately be available for the purchase of feed and seed.

It must also be remembered that if wheat is not sown by April 20 there is not much use in having seed. Last year, you will recall, I called attention to the seed situation and tried to impress upon the House the necessity of getting seed out to the farmers in time. This was not done, and many farmers did not receive their seed wheat until well along in May. As a result, the unprecedented rust which visited these States just before harvest caught all of the late-sown wheat. Most of the early-sown wheat escaped this damage. While North Dakota had over a hundred million bushel wheat crop in prospect, the rust reduced this to 50,000,000 bushels and the rusted wheat was reduced in weight from 42 pounds down to 30 pounds. This wheat had no sale value and in many instances sold for $15 per ton.

I trust this will not be repeated this year. I am fearful that a worse condition will prevail unless this Congress acts at once. As the President has worked out the plan of furnishing feed and seed, the whole administration of it has been turned over to the resettlement administrations of the various States.

Before a farmer, in need of feed and seed, can secure the money he must make a written application to the resettlement administration of his State on forms that are long, involved, and intricate. No loan will be passed unless and until the following precedent conditions have been met (quoting from the instructions of the Resettlement Administration):

The plan under which the Resettlement Administration operates calls for approved farm and home management budgets worked out by the local supervisor in cooperation with the local county agent. In this way every possible method of making the farm pay and operating the home economically is outlined.

"At the same time the recipient of the loan is given the benefit of the farming knowledge of people thoroughly familiar with agricultural conditions in his county", said State Director _____. "The county supervisor confers with the farmer applicant on proper cultivation methods and at the same time the housewife is given every assistance in the homemaking budget. In this way they get both a loan and expert assistance."

Those eligible, the State director said, are farm owners, farm tenants, farm laborers, sharecroppers, or persons who, when last employed, obtained the major portion of their income from farming operations. They must be the heads of destitute or low-income farm families who are unable to obtain credit at reasonable terms from other Federal or private credit agencies.

Those judged capable are being extended loans for the purchase of livestock, seed, fertilizer, and other necessities, and are given up to 5 years to repay loans. In addition, short-term loans of 1 or 2 years for rent, subsistence, medical care, etc., are made. No family is granted a loan until the budget expenditure plan has been carefully mapped out on a basis making repayment probable. Applications should be made to the county resettlement supervisor or to the county agricultural agent.

The less aid is given the farmers now, immediately, for feed and seed, the worse their condition will be. Finally they will have to seek direct relief. If that is what this administration wants, then the resettlement plans and specifications are admirably calculated to accomplish this purpose. Congress should step in now and pass a joint resolution giving definite instructions as to how these loans are to be made. I have no faith that the various administrations—Farm Credit or Resettlement—will ever cut out the red tape and get this feed and seed to the farmers in time.

There is one other matter, Mr. Speaker, in which the Relief Administration, as it operates, is committing an unpardonable blunder. It is this: Under the W. P. A., according to the program announced, no one who was not on F. E. R. A. last year is qualified to receive work in the W. P. A. In cases where farmers, through self-denial and pride kept off relief until now, that farmer finds that it is too late now for him to get work. When he makes application for help the first time in his life, he is turned down because the records do not show he was on relief last year. This program is most unfair and it is now causing a great deal of suffering in the Northwest States. There are thousands of farmers in desperate need of the necessities of life. They do not ask for charity. They ask for work, but that work is refused them for the reasons given above.

That was not the intent of Congress when it voted this huge fund of $4,800,000,000. Congress made a mistake in granting this fund without some control over it. No one, except the President, can change the matter now. He has failed in his plans to provide help for those who have kept off relief heretofore. Congress should step in now and by a new appropriation provide for those whom the President has forgotten. The "forgotten man" was quite an issue in the last campaign, but, as this relief plan now operates, the "forgotten man" is still forgotten.

In a land of plenty—a land of too much—we owe the duty to the unfortunate to provide the necessities of life. I am for doing that very thing even if the so-called Budget is never balanced. Between balancing the Budget and feeding hungry people, I am for the people. Business interests could go a long way toward balancing the Budget if they would now give back the rebates on income taxes that were handed back to them.

It is much easier to praise than censure; it is easier to agree than disagree; it is easier to accept things as they are than to find fault. When the times comes, however, when good, honest, hard-working people in this country are in distress, through no fault of their own, I stand ready to be accused of censuring, of disagreeing, and with finding fault. I know of no other way in getting the truth to the people;

I know no other way than to appeal to the public conscience of the Nation. I am thankful that I have no party ties that prevent me from stating the facts as they are. I am thankful, too, that I have no political ambition of any kind other than to represent the people of North Dakota and this Nation as Congressman for the term for which I have been elected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 543. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3424. An act to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Education of the Committee on the District of Columbia may be permitted to sit during the session of the House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL EMERGENCY RELIEF APPROPRIATION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 543, making additional appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Senate amendment: In line 11, after the word "law", insert: "There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE POWER OF THE COURT AT HOME AND ABROAD

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, a review of powers of the high courts in the advanced nations of the world, insofar as their authority to declare legislative acts invalid or unconstitutional, presents an interesting and somewhat paradoxical study. Constitutional governments are well split on the question of whether or not the judiciary should be empowered with the authority to overrule and invalidate laws enacted by a representative legislature. In some countries the constitution specifically vests the courts with authority to pass upon the validity of laws, in others the courts pass upon the constitutionality of legislative proposals before the legislature acts, and in still others the courts have no jurisdiction over constitutionality of law and the people's representatives assume that responsibility.

The Constitution of the United States does not grant the Supreme Court power to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of the Congress. This prerogative of the Court is based upon a precedent established by Chief Justice Marshall in 1803—Marbury against Madison—when he handed down a decision declaring a law passed by Congress contrary to the intent of the Constitution. This assumed power of the Court, however, was not exercised again for 54 years. In 1857 Chief Justice Taney, using the Marbury against Madison decision as a precedent, decided for the second time against the constitutionality of an act of Congress in the historic Dred Scott decision. Since that time the validity of numerous laws has been decided by the Court; and today, with a total of 74 laws declared to be unconstitutional by the Court, the principle is firmly established.

In Norway and Rumania procedure similar to our own American court history has resulted in the assumption by the courts of the right to declare laws unconstitutional.

The constitution of Colombia is probably the most definite in conferring authority upon its supreme court in that the court is specifically directed to decide upon the constitutionality of legislative acts which may have been objected to by the Government as unconstitutional. In Mexico the supreme court is given similar jurisdiction in all controversies arising between powers of Government and any State as to the constitutionality of their acts.

In Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Czechoslovakia authority is given to the courts to pass upon the constitutionality of legislative proposals prior to their enactment into law. In Salvador the supreme court may even initiate legislation which in its judgment would correct imperfections or deficiencies in existing law. In Czechoslovakia a special constitutional court is provided by the constitution separate and apart from the regular judiciary, which passes upon the validity of legislative measures before they may be enacted into law.

Germany is in a position somewhat like the United States prior to the Marbury against Madison decision. The question of the court's authority to pass upon the constitutionality of laws is not mentioned and will be decided in the future by custom and legal precedents.

In varying degrees and in some cases with qualifications, at least 11 major constitutional governments do not permit consideration or usurpation of the legislature's prerogatives, with respect to the constitutionality of its acts, by the judiciary. England, Japan, Italy, Finland, New Zealand, Belgium, France, Australia, Switzerland, Union of South Africa, and Canada confer upon their legislatures the duty and responsibility of determining the validity of the measures which they consider. In England, where law is based upon precedent and a bill of rights rather than a written constitution, the Parliament is the supreme power and no court may question the authority of its acts. In Australia the legislature may confer upon the courts, in specific instances, the right to pass upon the constitutionality of a law.

Periodically, and with increasing intensity, the question rises in the United States whether the Supreme Court's assumed authority over acts of Congress is in the best interests of a representative democracy. This same controversy is known to every constitutional government and, except perhaps in those nations where the court is specifically stripped of jurisdiction over constitutionality of law, at home and abroad the power of the court is a regular topic for debate.

When our courts divide so often and so evenly it is difficult for the lawmaker to decide in advance on the constitutionality of any given question. A better system which would obviate the tremendous work and expense involved in the preparation and passage of legislation and the injury resulting from the delay and uncertainty would help our country's situation. At any rate, I believe the Court should pass on legislation.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY FLOOD CONDITIONS

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein a radio address made by my colleague [Mr. GRANFIELD] in Springfield, Mass., on Saturday last on the flood situation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the Record a radio address delivered by my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM J. GRAN-

FIELD, on Saturday evening, March 21, 1936, at Springfield, Mass., on the flood conditions in the Connecticut Valley, as follows:

Early this week I was impressed with the seriousness of the situation that confronted the people of the Connecticut Valley. I realized the appalling effects that follow in the wake of a flood such as the one we have experienced.

The mayors of Springfield, Chicopee, and Northampton impromptu action on the part of the Federal Government, in consequence of which I immediately communicated with the Red Cross headquarters at Washington, where assurances were given me that the situation in the Connecticut Valley was well in hand and that its citizens would not be without food, clothing, or shelter.

I also contacted Harry L. Hopkins, National W. P. A. Administrator, who assured me that everything possible would be done for our people. Today at Washington Senator DAVID I. WALSH called a conference of the Members of Congress from Massachusetts in order to bring the full force of the Federal Government to the aid and relief of distress in our valley, and there a fourfold program of action was agreed upon.

It is proposed, first, that an emergency fund be provided for the general and immediate relief of our people, and that our homeowners who have suffered losses, which in some cases will prove irreparable, be provided for by the Federal Housing Administration.

Senator WALSH on Monday will present an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act extending the authority of that Commission to authorize loans to industries, large and small, affected by this disaster. Many of our smaller business concerns which have been seriously affected, it is hoped, will be provided for under this amendment.

The havoc wrought by the flood to the bridges and highways was also considered, and enabling legislation will be presented to Congress on Monday by Congressman HOLMES, of Worcester, a member of the Committee on Highways and Bridges, so that immediate action may be taken for their restoration.

At a conference today I was assured by District Attorney Moriarty; Mayors Martens, of Springfield; Stonina, of Chicopee; and Dunn, of Northampton; and Chairman Thomas J. Costello, of the county commission, that every effort would be made to ameliorate the severity of this flood. I want the people of this valley to know that everything possible will be done for their immediate relief. I cannot forego this opportunity to extol the very splendid and humanitarian services of the American Red Cross. Yesterday, in a conference with Mr. Earle, of that organization, at Washington, I was assured of the fullest cooperation. Today, after a personal survey, I am thoroughly satisfied that the American Red Cross has done its full duty to the people of the Connecticut Valley, and I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the organization and those members who have worked so tirelessly for our people.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, and at the conclusion of the special orders, I be allowed to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, already 40 minutes have been granted. We have a rule coming in with 2 hours of general debate. Ordinarily I figure the bill will not be voted on until 7 or 8 o'clock tomorrow night. There is a long discussion on it. Monday would be a much better day. We would not have granted the 40 minutes had we been aware they were being asked at the time. I wish the gentleman would put it off until Monday. Otherwise we will be here until 9 or 10 o'clock tomorrow night.

Mr. HOOK. I should like to do so, but I can assure the gentleman it will only be for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook]?

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

IMPORTATION OF COTTON GOODS FROM JAPAN

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend as a part of my remarks a letter from the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, signed by Mr. Russell Fisher, and a copy of a letter that he sent to the Department of Commerce; also some tables from the Department of Commerce showing the increase of Japanese cotton imports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters and table:

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COTTON MANUFACTURERS,
Boston, Mass., March 25, 1936.

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: Early this year we sent you copy of a resolution passed at a meeting of our member mills protesting the continued and increasing importation of cotton goods from Japan. It was apparent from statements made by State Department officials at the time that they felt the matter had been adequately taken care of through an agreement reached with the Japanese Government.

Now, that figures for January 1936 are available, it is very evident that the importation of Japanese cotton goods continues as an increasing threat, and that the agreement with the Japanese Government falls far short of what is desirable.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter and table prepared by the Cotton Textile Institute on this subject which, I think, will be of interest to you.

Yours very truly,

RUSSELL T. FISHER.

THE COTTON-TEXTILE INSTITUTE, INC.,
New York, March 23, 1936.

DEAR SIR: You will doubtless recall the pleasant conference which we had with you about 2 months ago regarding importations from Japan, and in this connection I wonder whether the figures for January covering imports of cotton piece goods from Japan have come to your attention? A total of 6,812,986 square yards were imported for consumption, which is a volume more than double that of January 1935, and some 2,000,000 square yards greater than that of the peak month of February 1935. This is at the rate of over 80,000,000 square yards per year, compared with a total for 1935 of about 36,474,000 square yards.

To give you a more complete picture, I am enclosing a table of imports of these cotton piece goods from Japan for a period of years. The greatest bulk, you will note, is in the "bleached" classification. The total imports of this type in 1933 were 256,624 square yards; in 1934, 6,043,345 square yards; in 1935, 30,041,422 square yards; and in January 1936, 5,842,933 square yards—which is at the rate of over 70,000,000 square yards per year.

The major portion of this type of goods is used by the handkerchief and underwear trades. Therefore the imports from Japan of cotton handkerchiefs are closely related to the imports of bleached piece goods. The attached table, covering importations of cotton handkerchiefs, indicates the enormous growth of business enjoyed by the Japanese in recent years. The 505,518 dozens imported in January 1936 are doubtless the equivalent of at least 1,000,000 square yards of bleached cloth. When it is realized that the estimated annual volume of domestic business in bleached print cloths for the handkerchief and underwear trades is only 150,000,000 yards, the significance of these combined imports—bleached cloth and handkerchiefs—is seen in its true perspective.

Another division of our industry which is sorely oppressed is the cotton velveteen group. A table showing the rapid expansion of imports from Japan in this category is also enclosed. From a total volume of about 1,000 square yards during the 9 years 1925 to 1933 importations jumped to nearly 84,000 square yards in 1934 (all of which arrived in the last 4 months of the year) and to the amazing total of 1,793,557 square yards in 1935. The volume imported last year is estimated to be over 50 percent of the domestic production for that year. The active season for velveteens is June to October, inclusive, which accounts for the substantial falling off of imports commencing in November 1935.

Another most disturbing development has been the arrival in this country during December 1935 and January 1936 of over 100,000 square yards of Japanese cloth under the unbleached classification. Last May, at a hearing before the Tariff Commission in the matter of importations of bleached goods from Japan, representatives of the Japanese importers claimed that it was not practicable or possible for the Japanese exporters to extend their activities with respect to shipments to the United States to other types of cloth. Nevertheless, since that time we have seen the tremendous expansion of receipts in this country of cotton velveteens, and more recently the above-mentioned unbleached goods.

There is nothing of special merit in these importations. They are largely imitations of American cloths, but, with Japanese labor costs only one-seventh or one-eighth of our labor costs, the effectiveness of the Tariff Act of 1930 is completely destroyed. Consequently we find Japanese bleached goods selling in our markets from three-fourths to 1½ cents a yard below the cost of comparable American goods; also Japanese velveteens from 10 to 25 cents a yard below the cost of comparable American products. And this does not reflect the full effect of the competition. Other American goods, which normally sell in price brackets bearing certain relationships to goods now in competition with Japanese goods, are adversely affected, first, by the destruction of the long-established differentials; and, second, by the threat of extension of activities by Japanese imports to types of cloth hitherto not brought into this country.

Needless to say, there will be little opportunity for our industry to make any further contribution toward relieving the unemployment situation when a rapidly increasing proportion of its market is being supplied by a foreign country. Nor can our industry be expected to contribute materially to improvement in the durable-goods industry when investments in replacements of machinery, etc., would doubtless result in outright loss.

The answer is that this industry needs and deserves relief from the rapidly increasing threat from Japanese importations. The instrument for that relief seems to be available in section 22 of the A. A. A., now made applicable by amendment to the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. In effect this section has the same force as section 3 (e) of the N. I. R. A. Early in 1935, pursuant to a complaint under that Recovery Act section, the Tariff Commission investigated importations of Japanese bleached cotton cloth. Due to the invalidation of the act, however, the findings of the Commission have never been released.

In view of the work already accomplished, it would seem that little additional study would be necessary preparatory to initiating prompt hearings. We also understand that the members of the Tariff Commission are thoroughly familiar with the velvetene situation. Therefore, there seems to be no obstacle which would prevent prompt hearings before the Tariff Commission with respect to these imports.

Your good offices in behalf of the cotton-textile industry will be greatly appreciated.

Faithfully yours,

CLAUDIUS T. MURCHISON.

That title I of the National Housing Act, as amended, be further amended as follows:

Section 1 of title I is amended by adding at the end of said section the following paragraph:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator shall have the power, under and subject to regulations prescribed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to assign or sell at public or private sale, or otherwise dispose of, any evidence of debt, contract claim, property, or security assigned to or held by him, and to collect or compromise all obligations assigned to or held by him and all legal or equitable rights accruing to him in connection with the payment of insurance under section 2 of this title, until such time as such obligations may be referred to the Attorney General for suit or collection."

Sec. 2. Section 2 of title I is amended, effective on and after April 1, 1936, to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. The Administrator is authorized and empowered, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to insure banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building and loan associations, installment lending companies, and other such financial institutions, which the Administrator finds to be qualified by experience or facilities as eligible for credit insurance, against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit not in excess of $2,000, and purchases of obligations representing such loans and advances of credit, made by them on and after April 1, 1936, and prior to April 1, 1937, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and improvements upon real property by the owners thereof or lessees of such real property under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of the loan, and against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit, not in excess of $50,000, and purchases of obligations representing such loans and advances of credit, made during such period to owners of real property already improved by apartment or multiple-family houses, hotels, office, business, or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, churches, or manufacturing or industrial plants, or improved by some other structure which is to be converted into one of the above-mentioned types of structure, or to lessees thereof under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of the loan, for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and additions to such real property, and the purchase and installation of equipment and machinery thereon.

"In no case shall the insurance granted by the Administrator under this section to any such financial institution on loans, advances of credit, and purchases made by such financial institutions for such purposes after April 1, 1936, exceed 10 percent of the total amount of such loans, advances of credit, and purchases. The total liability incurred by the Administrator for all insurance granted under this section, including all insurance heretofore and hereafter granted, shall not exceed in the aggregate of $100,000,000. No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions as the Administrator shall prescribe in order to make credit available for the purposes of this title.

"The Administrator is authorized and empowered to transfer, under such regulations as he may prescribe, any insurance in connection with any loans and advances of credit which may be sold by one approved financial institution to another approved financial institution."

Sec. 3. Section 3 of title I is hereby repealed.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes."

Mr. BULKLEY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr.

STEIWER, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, memorializing Congress relative to requiring that preference be given to citizens of the United States in employment on unemployment-relief projects financed by Federal funds, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See resolutions printed in full when presented by Mr. WALSH on the 24th instant, p. 4242, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from Hon. Quintin Paredes, Resident Commissioner of the Philippines, remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 3486) to repeal the act entitled "An act relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States", and presenting certain data in connection therewith, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Workers Welfare Association of Ogden, Utah, favoring the adoption of the so-called workers' rights amendment to the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the South Carolina Aeronautics Commission, Columbia, S. C., praying for the creation by the Senate of a committee on air commerce and civil aviation, which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution of Local No. 374, National Federation of Post Office Clerks, of Buffalo, N. Y., protesting against the reinstatement of postal employees who quit the service for their own personal gain, and also favoring the establishment of a civil-service court of appeals, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade, of New York City, N. Y., favoring the reduction of Federal expenditures and the imposition of direct taxes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Retail Dry Goods Clerks Union; the A. W. P. R. A.; Local No. 164, Bakery and Confectionary Workers International Union, and Branch No. 417 of the Workmen's Circle, all of New York City, and Branch No. 3564, International Workers Order of Maspeth, Long Island, all in the State of New York, favoring the enactment of the bill (S. 3475) to provide for the establishment of a Nation-wide system of social insurance, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Canastota, N. Y., opposing Government ownership and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a paper in the nature of a petition from the Saranac Lake (N. Y.) Bar Association, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 2944, to prevent and make unlawful the practice of law before the Government departments, bureaus, commissions, and other agencies by those other than duly licensed attorneys at law, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the nursing committee of the Henry Street Visiting Nurse Service, New York City, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation to exempt licensed physicians, hospitals, and clinics from the provisions of law now excluding contraceptive supplies and medical literature relating to birth control from the mails and common carriers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York Board of Trade, New York City, N. Y., favoring the establishment of a uniform rate of 2 cents per ounce on first-class mail matter within the city of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jackson Heights and vicinity, Long Island, N. Y., praying for the enactment of the so-called Barry bill, providing postal consolidation for Queens County, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

IMPORTATION OF COTTON GOODS FROM JAPAN

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, treated as a petition, and appropriately referred a letter I have received from the secretary of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, Boston, Mass., giving information, including a table, prepared by the Cotton Textile Institute, on the continued and increasing importation of cotton goods from Japan.

There being no objection, the letters and table were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COTTON MANUFACTURERS,
Boston, Mass., March 25, 1936.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Early this year we sent you copy of a resolution passed at a meeting of our member mills, protesting the continued and increasing importation of cotton goods from Japan. It was apparent from statements made by State Department officials at the time that they felt the matter had been adequately taken care of through an agreement reached with the Japanese Government.

Now that figures for January 1936 are available, it is very evident that the importation of Japanese cotton goods continues as an increasing threat, and that the agreement with the Japanese Government falls far short of what is desirable.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter and table prepared by the Cotton Textile Institute on this subject, which I think will be of interest to you.

Yours very truly,

RUSSELL T. FISHER.

THE COTTON-TEXTILE INSTITUTE, INC.,
New York, March 23, 1936.

DEAR SIR: You will doubtless recall the pleasant conference which we had with you about 2 months ago regarding importations from Japan, and in this connection I wonder whether the figures for January covering imports of cotton piece goods from Japan have come to your attention? A total of 6,812,986 square yards were imported for consumption, which is a volume more than double that of January 1935, and some 2,000,000 square yards greater than that of the peak month of February 1935. This is at the rate of over 80,000,000 square yards per year, compared with a total for 1935 of about 36,474,000 square yards.

To give you a more complete picture, I am enclosing a table of imports of these cotton piece goods from Japan for a period of years. The greatest bulk, you will note, is in the "bleached" classification. The total imports of this type in 1933 were 256,624 square yards; in 1934, 6,043,345 square yards; in 1935, 30,041,422 square yards; and in January 1936, 5,842,933 square yards—which is at the rate of over 70,000,000 square yards per year.

The major portion of this type of goods is used by the handkerchief and underwear trades. Therefore the imports from Japan of cotton handkerchiefs are closely related to the imports of bleached piece goods. The attached table, covering importations of cotton handkerchiefs, indicates the enormous growth of business enjoyed by the Japanese in recent years. The 505,518 dozens imported in January 1936 are doubtless the equivalent of at least 1,000,000 square yards of bleached cloth. When it is realized that the estimated annual volume of domestic business in bleached print cloths for the handkerchief and underwear trades is only 150,000,000 yards, the significance of these combined imports—bleached cloth and handkerchiefs—is seen in its true perspective.

Another division of our industry which is sorely oppressed is the cotton velveteen group. A table showing the rapid expansion of imports from Japan in this category is also enclosed. From a total volume of about 1,000 square yards during the 9 years 1925 to 1933 importations jumped to nearly 84,000 square yards in 1934 (all of which arrived in the last 4 months of the year) and to the amazing total of 1,793,557 square yards in 1935. The volume imported last year is estimated to be over 50 percent of the domestic production for that year. The active season for velveteens is June to October, inclusive, which accounts for the substantial falling off of imports commencing in November 1935.

Another most disturbing development has been the arrival in this country during December 1935 and January 1936 of over 100,000 square yards of Japanese cloth under the unbleached classification. Last May, at a hearing before the Tariff Commission in the matter of importations of bleached goods from Japan, representatives of the Japanese importers claimed that it was not practicable or possible for the Japanese exporters to extend their activities with respect to shipments to the United States to other types of cloth. Nevertheless, since that time we have seen the tremendous expansion of receipts in this country of cotton velveteens, and more recently the above-mentioned unbleached goods.

There is nothing of special merit in these importations. They are largely imitations of American cloths, but with Japanese labor costs only one-seventh or one-eighth of our labor costs, the effectiveness of the Tariff Act of 1930 is completely destroyed. Consequently we find Japanese bleached goods selling in our markets from three-fourths to 1½ cents a yard below the cost of comparable American goods; also Japanese velveteens from 10 to 25 cents a yard below the cost of comparable American products. And this does not reflect the full effect of the competition. Other American goods, which normally sell in price brackets bearing certain relationships to goods now in competition with Japanese goods, are adversely affected, first, by the destruction of the long-established differentials; and, second, by the threat of extension of activities by Japanese imports to types of cloth hitherto not brought into this country.

Needless to say, there will be little opportunity for our industry to make any further contribution toward relieving the unemployment situation when a rapidly increasing proportion of its market is being supplied by a foreign country. Nor can our industry be expected to contribute materially to improvement in the durable-goods industry when investments in replacements of machinery, etc., would doubtless result in outright loss.

The answer is that this industry needs and deserves relief from the rapidly increasing threat from Japanese importations. The instrument for that relief seems to be available in section 22 of the A. A. A., now made applicable by amendment to the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Acts. In effect this section has the same force as section 3 (e) of the N. I. R. A. Early in 1935, pursuant to a complaint under that Recovery Act section, the Tariff Commission investigated importations of Japanese bleached cotton cloth. Due to the invalidation of the act, however, the findings of the Commission have never been released. In view of the work already accomplished, it would seem that little additional study would be necessary preparatory to initiating prompt hearings. We also understand that the members of the Tariff Commission are thoroughly familiar with the velveteen situation. Therefore there seems to be no obstacle which would prevent prompt hearings before the Tariff Commission with respect to these imports.

Your good offices in behalf of the cotton-textile industry will be greatly appreciated.

Faithfully yours,

CLAUDIUS T. MURCHISON.

APPORTIONMENT OF FUNDS FOR SLUM CLEARANCE

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, treated as a petition, and appropriately referred, a letter I have received from the secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, embodying resolutions adopted by the executive council of the federation, urging the apportionment of funds for the purpose of subsidizing through local agencies the work of slum clearance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Boston, Mass., March 24, 1936.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: At the meeting of the executive council of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor held on Friday, March 20, it was voted to urge you to consider favorably the apportionment of funds for the purpose of subsidizing through local agencies the work of slum clearance.

For the past 4 years the rate of building for family living units has been but 15 to 20 percent of normal requirements. The Federal Housing Administration has failed to provide the necessary new construction in the field of single-family dwellings or of low-cost multiple units.

During the past 2½ years we have perfected in Massachusetts a responsible State housing board, along with local housing authorities, who, we feel, are capable of dealing with housing problems.

We now believe that the time is opportune to give consideration to large groups of our people who have not had an opportunity to live under decent and sanitary conditions. We request that a substantial amount of money scheduled for relief be diverted toward the providing of legitimate employment in projects of a self-liquidating nature. This would not only provide employment, but it would assure for large numbers of wage earners an opportunity to live in quarters conforming to a decent American standard.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT J. WAIT,
Secretary-Treasurer.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 3784) to extend the benefits of the Adams Act, the Purnell Act, and the Capper-Ketcham Act to the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1733) thereon.

Mr. DUFFY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I report back favorably with amendments a joint resolution to award a posthumous Congressional Medal of Honor to a very distinguished soldier of my State, William Mitchell, and I submit a report (No. 1734) thereon.

The joint resolution reported by Mr. DUFFY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, is Senate Joint Resolution 219, authorizing the President of the United States to award a posthumous Congressional Medal of Honor to William Mitchell.

MODIFICATION OR CANCELATION OF CERTAIN CONTRACTS

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 238) to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, and I submit a report (No. 1732) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, as amended, be amended by striking out "March 31, 1936" and inserting in lieu thereof "May 31, 1936": Provided, That the right of the United States to annul any fraudulent or illegal contract or to institute suit to recover sums paid thereon is in no manner affected by this joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief explanation to the Senate. As is well known, for some years the Government has been paying a subsidy to ocean-mail carriers. That subsidy amounts to a considerable sum, between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000 a year. There has been great doubt expressed about the contracts. About 2 years ago section 5 of the Economy Act authorized the President to examine and report upon the validity of those contracts. The Postmaster General made a report in which it was held that a large number of them were invalid. The President has never acted on that report, but has sent a message to Congress in which he recommended that independent merchant-marine subsidy legislation be enacted. Such proposed legislation is now before the Senate in the form of a bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and approved by the Committee on Commerce. That bill cannot be passed before the 31st of March. On that day the President's authority expires.

The joint resolution to which I have referred merely extends that authority for 60 days. The Post Office Department thinks it ought to be done. It seems to me it is perfectly clear, knowing the condition of the business of the Senate and the procedure as we all do, that the time should be extended. I ask that the joint resolution may be considered and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee if section 5, which I have not before me at the present time, relates to air-mail contracts?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it includes only the ocean-mail contracts, as I recall. I do not have it before me at the moment, but I am quite sure it does not apply to air-mail contracts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask if the joint resolution has been considered by any committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. It was before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads this morning, and was unanimously reported by that committee. We will have to act quickly, because the 31st of March is not far away, and the joint resolution will have to go to the House for action. I hope the Senator from Maine will see fit to make no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Has the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the chairman of the Commerce Committee, given consideration to the joint resolution?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have been spoken to about the joint resolution. It is a matter of utter indifference to me whether or not it passes. Last year I tried to have the time extended to the 30th of June, but the Senate was not willing to do so. So far as I am concerned, I do not care whether it passes or whether it does not pass. I repeat, it is a matter of utter indifference to me.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, is it the design of the joint resolution to extend the time for action upon the contracts which are now existing until real action may be taken or action may be defeated upon a merchant-marine bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the purpose of it?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the purpose, simply to extend the time for 60 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the report of the committee to accompany the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 1732. To accompany S. J. Res. 238]

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, to which was referred Senate Joint Resolution 238, a resolution to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, after having considered the same, beg leave to report the resolution back to the Senate with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, as amended, provides as follows:

"Sec. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the President, in respect of any contract entered into by the United States prior to the date of enactment of this act for the transportation of persons and/or things, that the full performance of such contract is not required in the public interest, and that modification or cancellation of such contract will result in substantial savings to the United States, the President is hereby, upon giving 60 days' notice and opportunity for public hearing to the parties to such contract, authorized, in his discretion, on or before April 30, 1935, to modify or cancel such contract. Whenever the President shall modify or cancel any such contract, he shall determine just compensation therefor; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the individual, firm, or corporation entitled to receive the same, such individual, firm, or corporation shall be entitled to receive such portion thereof as the President shall determine and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said portion so received, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by paragraph 20 of section 41 and section 250 of title 28 of the United States Code: Provided, That where any such contract makes provision for settlement in the event of modification or cancellation, the amount of just compensation as determined hereunder shall not exceed such amount as is authorized by said contract. Any appropriation out of which payments upon the said contract were authorized to be made is hereby made available for the payment of such just compensation."

Under the authority of that act the Postmaster General made a lengthy report some time ago concerning each and every one of the contracts therein mentioned, and holding a number of these invalid. The President has not yet acted on that report, and the time within which he may act expires March 31, 1936.

Since that time the President has recommended an independent subsidy bill, and the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, acting upon the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, has cut down the appropriation for ocean mail from $26,500,000 to $4,500,000 on the theory that subsidy legislation would be had at this session.

The Post Office Department desires that the time of the President be extended for 60 days so that the bill which has been reported from the Senate Committee on Commerce may be considered.

Your committee recommends the passage of this resolution.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES—INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 254 and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution reported by the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 254), submitted by Mr. BLACK on the 12th instant, reported by the Special Committee to Investigate Lobbying Activities, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and by that committee reported with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "figures", to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$62,500", so as to make the resolution read.

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 165 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, providing for an investigation of lobbying activities in connection with the so-called holding company bill (S. 2796), agreed to July 11, 1935, is further amended by substituting the figures "$62,500" for the figures "$50,000" on line 12, page 2, of the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on March 26, 1936, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 3699) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a center of music and its contribution to the art of music for the past 50 years.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. POPE:

A bill (S. 4375) to revise the tax on furs; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BURKE:

A bill (S. 4376) authorizing the State of Iowa, acting through its State highway commission, and the State of Nebraska, acting through its department of roads and irrigation, to construct, maintain, and operate a free or toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Dodge Street in the city of Omaha, Nebr.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WALSH (by request):

A bill (S. 4377) to amend an act approved June 16, 1934, entitled "An act to provide relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 4378) granting a pension to William W. Harvey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MINTON:

A bill (S. 4379) for the relief of the Indiana Limestone Corporation; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MURPHY:

A bill (S. 4380) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Donovan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COPELAND (by request):

A bill (S. 4381) to extend the benefits of the Employees' Compensation Act of September 7, 1916, to James M. Winter; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4382) to promote the efficiency of the Army Air Corps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11945) granting the consent of Congress to the Department of Public Works of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the construction, maintenance, and operation of certain free highway bridges to replace bridges destroyed by flood in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

OPERATION OF FOREIGN AND AMERICAN SHIPS IN FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. BLACK submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 269) requesting certain information concerning the operation of foreign ships and of American ships engaged in foreign trade (submitted by Mr. TYDINGS on the 19th inst.), which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGES IN CERTAIN SENATE SALARIES AND POSITIONS

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted Senate Resolution 269, which was ordered to lie on the table. I now desire to modify the resolution in line 5 by striking out the word "directed" and inserting the word "authorized", and I ask that the resolution then be referred to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask, is the resolution one referring to salary increases of Senate employees?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator desires to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution, as modified, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS AND POLICIES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions having reference to national affairs and policies adopted at the annual meeting of the Kansas Livestock Association at Topeka, Kans., March 6. As Mr. Joe H. Mercer, secretary of the association, says in a letter accompanying the resolutions:

I am sure that these resolutions express the views of every thinking farmer and livestock producer in this section of the country.

I should like particularly to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Kansas Livestock Association specifically endorses and urges the passage of the Capper-Hope-Wearing amendments to the Packers and Stockyards Act.

Those amendments are contained in S. 1424, which is the pending unfinished business before the Senate, having been temporarily laid aside for consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Also I can and do endorse the general program set forth in these resolutions, and I especially urge careful consideration by the Senate of the recommendation that the Argentine convention pact be not ratified. I am strongly opposed to the ratification of that pact, as I believe it would result in large importations of cattle and beef from the Argentine which would subject our cattle to foot-and-mouth disease. I ask the resolution be printed as a part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Topeka, Kans., March 16, 1936.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am enclosing you a copy of the principal resolutions passed at the annual convention of the Kansas Livestock Association in Topeka, March 6, 1936, which have reference to national matters.

I am sure these resolutions express the views of every thinking farmer and livestock producer in this section of the country. A copy of these has been sent also to the members of the Kansas delegation in Washington.

Very truly,

J. H. MERCER, Secretary.

Resolutions adopted at the annual convention of the Kansas Livestock Association, Topeka, Kans., March 6, 1936

(1) We demand protection for fats and oils of both vegetable and animal origin produced in continental United States against the competition of vegetable oils of foreign origin. We specifically demand that excise taxes be maintained in respect to the domestic utilization of coconut oil produced in the Philippines.

(2) We commend the United States Bureau of Animal Industry for eradicating the hoof and mouth disease and other foreign infections from our livestock. We urge strict regulations be maintained to prevent reinfection from contagious diseases now present in foreign countries. We further urge legislation to prevent importation of dairy products unless such products are produced from herds free from tuberculosis and other contagious and infectious diseases.

(4) We urge the passage by Congress of the Capper-Hope-Wearin amendments to the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921.

(6) We urge that no processing taxes as provided for under the invalidated Agricultural Adjustment Act be levied on livestock or livestock products, but that any additional Federal taxation made necessary by expenditures under the Soil Conservation Act, as amended, be provided for through a Federal retail sales tax.

(7) We urge that livestock and livestock products be given complete protection by tariff from foreign competition in order that the home market may be preserved for our own producers. Also, that livestock and livestock products be given protection from the competition of production on lands under Federal control.

(8) We urge that our Senators oppose the ratification of the Argentine Convention pact.

STEAMSHIP CONFERENCES AND THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter written to me by Mr. P. J. Williams and also a letter written to me by the Raphael Steamship Line on the subject of steamship conferences and the pending ship-subsidy bill.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 26, 1936.

Re: Foreign ship conference operations; American and foreign ship operations.

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK,
United States Senator (Mo.),
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CLARK: I note in this morning's issue of the New York Herald Tribune that Mr. R. C. Lee, vice president of Moore & McCormack Steamship Co., has written you defending conference operations and condemning Government operation of the American merchant marine. I do not agree with Mr. Lee and his statements and take this opportunity of submitting the following facts for your information on this subject:

CONFERENCE OPERATIONS

I call your attention to the statements made by the late Mr. Dockendorf, then president of the Black Diamond Lines, as found on page 392 of volume 1 of the Special Senate Committee's Investigation of Ocean Mail Contracts. Mr. Dockendorf's own admissions before the Black committee bring out the fact that, as a result of a conference pooling agreement, the Black Diamond Lines received 33 1/3 percent of the Antwerp-Rotterdam traffic; the balance of 66 2/3 percent went to the foreign ship lines participating in this conference. The United States Shipping Board waived the penalties of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts for restraint of trade when they approved of this conference, which was for the entire benefit of the participating foreign lines. Since Mr. Dockendorf's death, Mr. Sudman has "broken" this conference pool and now operates on a 50-50 basis with the Royal Lloyd Belge Line in the Antwerp trade. I do not know what disposition has been made of the Rotterdam traffic.

At the Senate Commerce Committee hearings on March 10 the question of conference operations was discussed very thoroughly. At that time it developed that the West Mediterranean-United States Conference had increased the rates $1.25 per ton on traffic going to the port of Boston. This action was protested by Mr. Richard Parkhurst, vice chairman of the Boston Port Authority, in a telegram which was read at the hearings, inasmuch as it was a concrete example of how conference operations attempted, through a rate penalty, to discriminate against the port of Boston in favor of the port of New York, diverting the traffic out of Boston for benefit of New York. I telephoned Senator Gibson's office this morning on this matter and was informed that the "conference rate penalty" against Boston had been withdrawn by the conference, apparently as a result of the protest and discussion of this subject by the Senate Committee on Commerce. If the conference purposes are justifiable, as stated by Mr. Lee, then why did this mentioned conference withdraw their penalty against Boston which withdrawal is a result of the publicity given their discriminatory action? This was an arbitrary action aimed to divert the flow of traffic for benefit of the port of New York.

I have no data in the case of the Far East Conference of New York, but an examination of the participating ship lines again reveals that the foreign ship lines are in the majority. In this instance we have:

A. The Shipping Board's owned American Pioneer Line services to the Far East from United States Atlantic ports, operated by the Roosevelt Steamship Co., owned by the International Mercantile Marine Co. of New York. The Roosevelt Steamship Co. are members of this Far East Conference operating Shipping Board tonnage. I am very confident that if examination were made of the traffic carried by the American flag, American Pioneer Line, and the foreign-flag ship lines on this Far East trade, it would be found that again American ships carry the minor portion of the traffic. The Shipping Board has ample available ships suitable for this trade so that Roosevelt Steamship Co. could increase their tonnage any time if it were not for the fact that they are restricted by the conference agreements in which they participate. Again, I state that if this Shipping Board, American Pioneer Line, receives less than 50 percent of the total volume of traffic, that the Shipping Board's action in approving this minority conference agreement is another concrete example of how the Shipping Board have waived the Sherman and Clayton antitrust laws for benefit of foreign ship lines.

B. Another member of this conference is Barber Lines, of New York, owners of the American West African Line, a subsidized American-flag service. However, Barber Lines operate foreign-flag ships on the Far East trade, which are in competition with the Shipping Board's American Pioneer Line services.

AMERICAN- AND FOREIGN-FLAG SHIP OPERATION

A. Moore and McCormack Steamship Co. of New York. As per the enclosed advertisements taken from the New York Journal of Commerce on page 1 of the enclosed exhibits, you will note that this company are owners of the American Scantic Line. With respect to this American-flag service, I call your attention to the fact that no new tonnage has been provided for by the owners, and the reconditioning done on some few of their vessels is of a secondary character.

They operate the Mooremack Lines, which is a foreign-flag service to South America, in direct competition with the American-flag subsidized Munson Line, which is in bankruptcy and in the process of repossession by the Shipping Board. Foreign-flag ship competition on this route is the primary factor for the breakdown of the American-flag Munson Line. If American shipping companies want to run foreign-flag vessels, then they should and must be denied any American-flag services and any consideration for such services. The two cannot be combined and give the American merchant marine the full benefit of aggressive operation and constructive development.

B. Barber Lines of New York. An American steamship company, owners of the American-flag subsidized services, The American West African Line. This is the only American-flag service they operate and again I call your attention to the fact that no new tonnage has been laid down for these services.

Page 2 of the enclosed exhibits shows the foreign-flag services operated by Barber Lines to the Far East in competition with the Shipping Board's American Pioneer Line services. This is the Far East conference operation mentioned in this letter.

Page 3 of the enclosed exhibit shows the foreign-flag services of the Barber Lines in competition with the American-flag American-South African Line, a subsidized service operated and owned by the American-South African Line, Inc.

Page 4 of the enclosed exhibit shows the foreign-flag services of both Barber Lines and Moore and McCormack against the American-flag subsidized Munson Line to South America.

Another serious factor to be considered in this shipping problem is the fact that; in my many conversations with various people on the subject I have determined that for many months some American ship operators, who are faced with a cancelation of their mail contracts and possible loss of services as a result of the two investigations into shipping and the evidence thereto, these so-called American ship operators have instituted a deliberate campaign for continuation of their mail contracts under a threat of turning back their ships and going into foreign-ship operation entirely. In some instances, they have deliberately threatened such action by showing what appear to be attractive ship-construction offers from foreign shipyards and attractive charters for foreign-flag tonnage owned by foreign shipowners to certain Government officials having to do with the formulation of our shipping legislation.

This campaign has resulted in an apparent attitude of "leniency" toward these operators threatening such foreign-ship operation, who have been so severely and justifiably condemned in the reports of the Black committee and the Postmaster General. I question whether anything constructive can be accomplished for the merchant marine until these operators have been called to account, completely thrown out of American-flag shipping, and the administration of our shipping and merchant marine placed in the hands of courageous officials who will not be lenient in the face of such threats of foreign construction and operation.

I have every desire to be fair and just in my opinions and conclusions, but the facts as I have determined them, the facts and truths developed in two investigations of our merchant marine within the last 3 years, compel me to disagree sharply with the writer of the enclosed article and bring this matter to your attention.

Thanking you for your kind consideration, I remain,

Yours very truly,

P. J. WILLIAMS.

NEW YORK, March 26, 1936.

Hon. Senator BENNETT C. CLARK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In this morning's New York Tribune I read an article in which Mr. Robert C. Lee, vice president of Messrs. Moore & McCormack, quoted your views on the matter of steamship conferences.

In connection with this matter, I take pleasure in enclosing herewith copy of my letter of March 23 to the United States Shipping Board, which speaks for itself. There is no question in my mind that these conferences are a conspiracy for the restraint of trade as you indicate yourself, and I trust that you will take such steps to see that such abuses are done away with.

The penalty item is the most pernicious, as this gives the monopolizers the opportunity of establishing the amount of this penalty at figures that might prohibit smaller lines from participating therein. It does seem odd that companies that consider themselves honest should have to have such monetary deposit as a weapon to hold their members in line, and it does not speak very well for their integrity if that is the only basis that they can do business on. In commercial transactions we find no such penalty requirements; and if a conference member did not live up to his agreement, the other members naturally would have damages that could be easily established at law. On the present basis these monopolizers attribute to themselves the role of the courts, which in itself is also contrary to the fundamentals of our Government.

I have been identified with the steamship business for 25 years. I was the founder of the Raporel Steamship Line, Inc., in 1915; and, after 5 years' development, and being the first American steamship line to ply through the Leeward and Windward Islands and Guianas, the Clyde Steamship Line thought well enough of my connections in the Tropics to pay $225,000 cash for the goodwill of that company plus my obligation to not reenter the steamship business for a period of 10 years. That period has now elapsed, and I have started resumption of my service; and if the abuses now present can be done away with, I fully expect to have an operation of a line second to none; but if the powerful interests are able to not only get financial support from our Government, but also secure perhaps treble the amount that they are entitled to, are allowed to continue on the present status quo, then I doubt as to whether other good Americans can find their place under the sun in the shipping world. I might state that I have also been a member of the maritime committee of the New York Maritime Exchange, as well as a member of the New York Produce Exchange for 27 years, and I offer you my possibly meager services in any direction that you may care to utilize same.

Yours truly,

RAPHEL STEAMSHIP LINE, INC.,
EDWARD M. RAPHEL, President.

NEW YORK, March 23, 1936.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,

United States Shipping Board Bureau, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We have before us your letter of March 10 and thank you for agreement no. 4610, called the United States Atlantic and Gulf Ports-Jamaica (B. W. I.) Steamship Conference, and which we note was approved by your department on November 4, 1935, and which was eventually amended on January 2, 1936, and the rates of freight covered by same were eventually established in February 1936.

Regardless of the fact that we feel that we were completely ignored in the formation of this conference, we wish to further point out that, in our estimation, clause 6 of agreement of October 7, 1935, is in absolute restraint of trade and consequently should have no place in the rules and regulations of business in America. The paragraph in question refers to the deposit of a sum of money, in cash or otherwise, of $10,000, and which in itself might be sufficient reason for companies desiring to join being unable to do so. The acceptance of such restraint by your Bureau in the sum of $10,000 might grant privileges to these conference makers to designate the amount as $50,000 or $100,000, shutting out other shippers that might have liked to join such conference. The monopolizing of this business is further controlled by clauses 16 and 18.

Before proceeding further in this matter, we would appreciate your decision as to whether you consider such conference within the laws prohibiting restraint of trade.

Yours truly,

EDWARD M. RAPHEL, President.

INFLATION—ADDRESS BY PROF. H. B. HASTINGS

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a radio address on the subject Inflation Ahead, delivered by Prof. Hudson B. Hastings, of Yale University.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ever since the summer of 1933, when the weight of gold in the dollar was reduced by 41 percent, there has been an increasing amount of talk about inflation. And it is well that there should be, for we are now faced with the danger of a disastrous inflationary period.

There are many definitions of the term, but to the average person inflation means a rise in the prices of goods and services to points which are, on the average, considerably higher than those which have typically prevailed in recent years. This is not a satisfactory definition to economists but it is the sense in which I will use the term in this talk.

If asked their opinion, practically all Americans would say that they are opposed to inflation, but it would be, on the whole, a rather mild opposition.

In the first place, few people fully realize the terrible consequences of inflation, and, secondly, they do not know that its causes are definitely recognized and that it is possible to eliminate every one of them.

Now it is possible to classify inflation, as I have just defined the term, into two general types. First, slow inflation which is a somewhat moderate and irregular, but nevertheless sustained increase in prices over a long period of years. Second, rapid inflation or a very sharp increase in the general price level over a short period of time which is always followed by a collapse of prices and business activity.

An example of the first type was the rise in prices of about 40 percent from 1897 to 1914. An example of the second was the rise of prices of 150 percent from 1915 to 1920, followed by the severe drop in both prices and business activity in 1921.

Few economists classify these two American experiences as examples of inflation, since during the entire period, all forms of money were freely redeemable in gold. But call them what you will, the fact remains that both price movements caused much injustice and suffering. Let us see why.

During a period of slow inflation the real income of all those who work for others suffers a decline. This is because increases in wages and salaries always have, and always will, lag behind the rise in the cost of living. Farmers also lose heavily because the prices of the products of their toll rise less rapidly than the prices of the goods which they buy.

Still greater injustice is done to all those who have placed their savings or endowments in savings banks, bonds, mortgages, notes, life-insurance policies, or preferred stocks. The principal of their savings and the income therefrom remains an absolutely fixed number of dollars but the buying power of these dollars gradually diminishes. The thrifty are cheated out of the just rewards of their hard work and the sacrifices of saving. Likewise, pensioners, both public and private, suffer a progressive reduction in what their pensions will buy.

The only people who gain by slow inflation are some of the owners of business and the speculators.

It is certainly conservative to say that 9 out of every 10 people suffer a material and wholly unjust loss in the buying power of their dollar income during a slow inflation.

In a rapid inflation these losses and injustices are greatly increased, and, in addition, every rapid inflation in this and all other countries has always ended in a collapse of business activity and severe depression. The greater and more rapid the rise in prices, the more disastrous the consequences. There is not a single exception on record.

Even the owners of business and industry, and the financiers, suffer losses on the collapse and the ensuing depression which are, in most cases, far greater than the temporary gains during the prior period of rising prices. Only a negligible number of shrewd or lucky speculators gain, in the long run, from rapid inflation. For practically everybody it means financial disaster and suffering, often for a lifetime.

Thus slow inflation works injury to employees, pensioners, endowed institutions, and all whose savings are conservatively invested. Rapid inflation works disaster for practically everybody.

Let us turn now for a moment to the causes of inflation. Space limitation does not permit me to present an analysis of the relation of the volume of money to the price level, and I shall have to confine myself to an unsupported general statement that inflation will sooner or later occur when the volume of money in circulation continues to increase at a faster rate than the growth in the physical volume of business. By money, I mean to include both hand-to-hand money and commercial bank deposits subject to check. At the present time about four-fifths of our money supply consists of deposits subject to check, or, in other words, bank-credit money.

If the country maintains a gold standard, that is, all forms of money being freely redeemable in gold dollars of a fixed weight, then there is a rather definite limit to the amount of money which can be created on the given gold reserves and therefore a more or less definite limit to the possible rise in prices. But even under these conditions we have had disastrous inflations.

If, however, we reduce the weight of gold in the dollar we increase the possible degree of inflation, and if we abandon the gold standard entirely and finance a governmental deficit by the issue of irredeemable paper money there is no limit to the amount of money that may be put into circulation, and therefore no limit to the extent to which prices may rise. This is the most insidious and dangerous form of inflation. Once a country embarks on financing a governmental deficit by paper money all history shows that it is never stopped until the resulting inflation has brought disaster to its citizens.

The post-war paper-money inflation in France permanently wiped out four-fifths of the savings of the thrifty which had been placed in apparently the most secure form. In Germany such savings were entirely wiped out.

In our own country the rapid increase of prices by 150 percent from 1915 to 1920 was primarily due to the influx of gold from Europe and the expansion of bank credit money based on this new gold. Wages and salaries lagged seriously behind the rise in prices. Pensioners and those dependent on the income from savings suffered severely.

Then even more intense suffering followed the inevitable collapse. Unemployment and business failures were widespread and severe.

Furthermore, we were finally left with a price level about 50 percent above the prewar level, and thus thrifty individuals and endowed institutions had one-third of the buying power of the principal and interest of their wealth wiped out.

Let us now turn to our present situation.

If our voters had been living in Germany or France during the recent paper-money inflation in these countries, or in our own country during the Civil War, there is not the slightest question but that they would never have permitted their representatives in Congress to pass the law, which is still on the statute books, giving the President the power to issue $3,000,000,000 of greenbacks.

Congress should immediately repeal this law. No pay envelope is free from the danger of having a large part of its buying power destroyed. Savings and endowments are in jeopardy as long as it remains on the books.

This is the first step to be taken in the fight of the people against the present dangers of inflation, but let no one suppose that a decisive victory over the paper-money inflationists will remove all danger of a tremendous rise in prices in this country in the near future. Far from it.

First let me briefly mention the silver situation.

Congress has directed the Secretary of the Treasury to buy silver until we have one-third as much silver as gold. Up to now we have added about $450,000,000 to our silver-secured money, and, although it is not yet a potent influence, unless this law is repealed it will ultimately result in a considerable degree of inflation. For the moment, however, the gold situation and the heavily unbalanced Federal Budget constitute the greatest threats toward inflation—an inflation of much reater magnitude than we suffered from 1915 to 1920.

We now have $10,000,000,000 of gold reserves in our banking system, as compared with $4,000,000,000 in 1929, and gold is still pouring in from abroad. The principal cause of this enormous increase in our gold holdings was that ill-advised devaluation of the dollar by the President in 1933 to 59 percent of its former gold content. This immediately increased the dollar value of our gold bullion by nearly 70 percent.

Our present gold reserves will permit the creation of a supply of hand-to-hand and bank credit money sufficient to finance full business activity at prices at least three times as high as those existing today. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System cannot prevent a considerable degree of inflation unless the Federal Government cooperates by balancing its Budget.

If the Budget deficit could be financed by the sale of Government bonds to those who have real savings to invest, rather than to the commercial and Federal Reserve banks, it would not tend toward inflation. But under the present complicated situation, which I have not time to explain, the deficit must continue to be largely financed by the banks, or, in other words, by the creation of additional bank credit money.

Six billion dollars of bank credit money have already been created and put into circulation by the process of financing the Government deficits by borrowing from the banks.

The Budget recently recommended to Congress by the President showed a deficit of $1,500,000,000. To this must be added another $2,000,000,000 if relief disbursements are continued at their present rate, and probably another $600,000,000 to fulfill contracts with the farmers.

And now Congress passes the soldiers' bonus bill, over a half-hearted veto, compelling the Government to issue nearly $2,000,- 000,000 of bonds to veterans, and, worse still, to cash all bonds on demand at par at any post office. According to conservative estimates, this will call for a cash outlay during this coming summer of at least $1,000,000,000.

The Government thus proposes to operate at a deficit of more than $5,000,000,000 during the next fiscal year, and, under present conditions in the investment market, about $4,000,000,000 of this must be obtained by expanding our bank credit money.

The volume of such money already in circulation is nearly up to the levels of 1929, and the only reason that prices and volume of business are not more nearly up to normal is because of the sluggishness with which this money is circulating through the channels of trade. This, in turn, is due to the grave uncertainties for the future created by the heavily unbalanced Budget of the Federal Government and the unwise and unnecessary interference of the Government with our business and industrial activities and processes. With only moderately restored confidence in the business outlook, and a continuing unbalanced Budget of the present dimensions, we are certain to be plunged into an era of rapid inflation.

We are, in fact, face to face with the gravest threat to disastrous inflation which has confronted us since the greenback days of the Civil War. It can and should be stopped before it is too late. The steps which should be taken in the immediate future are:

First. Repeal the laws giving the President the power to issue $3,000,000,000 of greenbacks and the further power to devalue the gold dollar by another 17 percent;

Second. Repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934; and Third, and most important of all: Immediately and drastically reduce Federal expenditures and increase taxes to a point where the expenses and income of the Government will be brought into current balance within the next fiscal year.

It is absolutely essential that this be done if we are to prevent this rise in prices, which is already well under way, from developing into an inflation which will bring disaster to all.

ARTICLE ON SENATOR BENSON BY GEORGE CREEL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by George Creel on the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON] which was published in Collier's Weekly for March 21, 1936.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Collier's for Mar. 21, 1936]

FINISHING SCHOOL

By George Creel

There is nothing devious or secretive about ELMER A. BENSON, the 40-year-old Farmer-Laborite, newly arrived in the Senate of the United States from Minnesota to fill out the term of that rock-ribbed Republican, the late Thomas D. Schall. When it comes to political, social, and economic beliefs, he disdains even the traditional fig leaf, wearing every conviction in plain view. Not for him any revamping of the old order. What he wants is a brand new one, and he stands ready and willing to superintend the construction. Every pocket bulges with a plan.

At no point does Senator BENSON make any effort to conceal his radicalism. He is a left winger, so far to the left, in fact, that even the La Follettes will have to communicate with him by swift runners and smoke signals. Were it in his power, he would collect all of the international bankers, the munitions magnates, and heads of the great monopolies, have them expertly stuffed, and then hand them over to the Smithsonian Institution for the edification and education of posterity.

From all of which it might be argued that Elmer A. is the wild and woolly type, collarless and uncurried. On the contrary, he is slim, well-tailored, as precise in his speech as in his attire, and looks and acts far more like a young partner in the House of Morgan than a representative of the rampant and rebellious democracy of the Northwest.

To make attack by Senate conservatives even more difficult, they will not be able to tell him to go back where he came from if he doesn't like it here. As it happens, Master Elmer was born in Appleton, Minn., and quit his law school to go to France to fight for his country. His parents, it is true, were immigrants, but they came from solid, substantial Norway as far back as 1866 and played no mean part in turning Minnesota's virgin forests into fields and orchards.

A BIGGER AND BETTER NEW DEAL

To give his radicalism an even more respectable background, he quit the law to become a banker in his home town, and between the years of 1919 and 1933 rose to be a cashier. At the beginning of 1933 he was appointed State securities commissioner by Governor Floyd Olson, and a few months later was elevated to the post of State bank commissioner. As a proof of his persuasiveness, and by way of warning to Republican Senators, he succeeded in winning some of Minnesota's independent bankers to his way of thinking, so that today small-town money masters in Minnesota can be heard denouncing Wall Street and special privilege.

Democrats in the Senate thrilled mightily when the newcomer elected to sit on the administration side, but they are due for a shock if they proceed on the theory that the choice indicated unquestioning support of the President and his policies. On the contrary, Senator BENSON makes no bones of his belief that the New Deal has only pecked at problems. Instead of going too far, it has only made an encouraging start. Take, for instance, his attitude with respect to the A. A. A.

"Good enough in its way, but palpably a makeshift." Leaning forward, he tapped the desk with well-tended fingers by way of emphasis. "There can be no such thing as real recovery until the crushing debt burden has been lifted from agriculture. The Frazier-Lemke bill goes straight to the heart of the matter. Three billions in new currency will permit the purchase of Farm Credit Administration bonds that will be used to take up farm mortgages under a long-term financing plan at low interest rates.

"Printing-press money?" His smile was one of amused tolerance. "What have we got right now? Our currency is not redeemable in gold. It is nothing on earth but the Government's promise to pay. More than that, our printing of currency can go much further before it is near the danger point. We have some five billions in currency today. At the same time, the Federal Treasury has nine billions in gold and a billion and a half dollars' worth of silver. Even under the terms of the old law, which stipulated a 40-percent gold base for our currency, we would be justified in having approximately $22,000,000,000 in currency. So, far from having a dangerous expansion today, we do not possess even an adequate currency."

"The Supreme Court?" Here a very distinct irritation clouded the Senator's youthful face. "Well, one may have respect for the Constitution and the courts and at the same time question the authority of the judicial branch of Government to ride roughshod over the executive and legislative branches. Certainly the people of today have the right to deal with the problems of today as their needs require, and I have the deep conviction that there is a growing resentment against five-to-four decisions which have all the earmarks of economic judgments rather than conclusions based on law."

THE MAN WITHOUT DOUBTS

Along with his money views and his impatience with Supreme Court curbs, Senator BENSON believes implicitly that all natural resources ought to be brought under popular control for fullest development, and particularly is he insistent on the public ownership and operation of all public utilities. Rural electrification, in his opinion, can and should be carried to a point where there is electric light and power in every barn.

"Government ownership of railroads?" The lift of his eyebrows expressed surprise at the question. "Of course! It is the one and only way to a fair and effective machinery of distribution."

"No." He shook his head when asked about the "share our wealth" movement. "Nevertheless, the concentration of the country's income in a few hands is an evil that must be cured. How? Why, by a fearless extension of the Roosevelt tax program to a point where society will reclaim that portion of wealth which represents mass cooperation."

The Townsend plan likewise fails to excite his enthusiasm, but in the same breath he insists that the present social-security law is "grossly inadequate" in the matter of pensions for America's aged. "A far more generous provision for our old must be made," he declared.

"Production for use? I have never believed in the possibility of creating economic islands or the possibility of any new type of civilization in a community or a State wholly apart from the life of the Nation. I do hold, however, that we have got to cure the disparity between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays; that we have got to bridge the big gap between America's purchasing power and America's producing capacity."

"Chain banks and chain stores and chains of every kind have no place in the American scheme of things. I mean to work for drastic legislation that will put an end to monopolistic combinations and pyramidal finance by means of which powerful, distant groups are able to drain the wealth out of every American community."

KNOWS HIS POLITICS

Let no one make the blunder of writing the Minnesotan down as a yeasty, impractical emotionalist. He is every whit as hard-headed and assured in his own way as any Old Guard Republican, and knows his politics just as well, if not better. He represents, in fact, a distinct change in the radical movement's type and idea, standing for plan, purpose, and organization as opposed to fanatical individualism. The Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota, for instance, is no longer a loose thing, held together by indignations, but a disciplined body that works with all the iron precision of an intelligent political machine. About the only point of difference is in the frankness with which intentions are announced and orders given. Witness, as an example, the following editorial from a Minnesota paper at the time of the Benson appointment:

"From their standpoint, the managers of the Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota are fully justified in sending BENSON to the Senate. He is their choice for governor to take over that office when Olson's term ends, and Olson goes to the Senate. A year in Washington will give BENSON more opportunity to develop as a public speaker. It will give him a chance to mix with national leaders, sit in high places, deal with national and world problems, and to return for the 1936 campaign with a bigger reputation. It will give him the use of the franking privilege, which means that he can mail speeches and statements into all parts of the State without paying postage. This will be a big help in making his name familiar to the voters in preparation for the campaign after he has been nominated for governor."

Could James Aloysius Farley do it any better?

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the order entered yesterday, the Senate will proceed with the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning with the number at which the Senate left off yesterday.

SALES OF GOODS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, yesterday when Senate bill 3450, being Order of Business No. 1599, was reached on the calendar, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], believing that it provided for the imposition of a sales tax, interposed an objection. As a matter of fact, it merely is an ordinary commercial sales measure such as obtains in 42 States of the Union. I now ask unanimous consent to recur to that bill on the calendar, because I am sure there is no objection to the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3450) to regulate the sales of goods in the District of Columbia was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after July 1, 1935, all sales of goods in the District of Columbia shall be made under and in accordance with the following provisions of law:

PART I

FORMATION OF THE CONTRACT

SECTION 1. Contracts to sell and sales: (1) A contract to sell goods is a contract whereby the seller agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a consideration called the "price."

(2) A sale of goods is an agreement whereby the seller transfers the property in goods to the buyer for a consideration called the "price."

(3) A contract to sell or a sale may be absolute or conditional.

(4) There may be a contract to sell or a sale between one part owner and another.

Sec. 2. Capacity—Liabilities for necessities: Capacity to buy and sell is regulated by the general law concerning capacity to contract, and to transfer and acquire property.

Where necessities are sold and delivered to an infant, or to a person who by reason of mental incapacity or drunkenness is incompetent to contract, he must pay a reasonable price therefor.

"Necessaries" in this section means goods suitable to the condition in life of such infant or other person, and to his actual requirements at the time of delivery.

FORMALITIES OF THE CONTRACT

Sec. 3. Form of contract or sale: Subject to the provisions of this act and of any statute in that behalf, a contract to sell or a sale may be made in writing (either with or without seal), or by word of mouth, or partly in writing and partly by word of mouth, or may be inferred from the conduct of the parties.

Sec. 4. Statute of frauds: (1) A contract to sell or a sale of any goods or choses in action of the value of $500 or upwards shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods or choses in action so contracted to be sold or sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the contract, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract or sale be signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf.

(2) The provisions of this section apply to every such contract or sale, notwithstanding that the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time or may not at the time of such contract or sale be actually made, procured, or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery; but if the goods are to be manufactured by the seller especially for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business, the provisions of this section shall not apply.

(3) There is an acceptance of goods within the meaning of this section when the buyer, either before or after delivery of the goods, expresses by words or conduct his assent to becoming the owner of those specific goods.

SUBJECT MATTER OF CONTRACT

Sec. 5. Existing and future goods: (1) The goods which form the subject of a contract to sell may be either existing goods, owned or possessed by the seller, or goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract to sell, in this act called "future goods."

(2) There may be a contract to sell goods, the acquisition of which by the seller depends upon a contingency which may or may not happen.

(3) Where the parties purport to effect a present sale of future goods the agreement operates as a contract to sell the goods.

Sec. 6. Undivided shares: (1) There may be a contract to sell or a sale of an undivided share of goods. If the parties intend to effect a present sale, the buyer, by force of the agreement, becomes an owner in common with the owner or owners of the remaining shares.

(2) In the case of fungible goods, there may be a sale of an undivided share of a specific mass, though the seller purports to sell and the buyer to buy a definite number, weight, or measure of the goods in the mass, and though the number, weight, or measure of the goods in the mass is undetermined. By such a sale the buyer becomes owner in common of such a share of the mass as the number, weight, or measure bought bears to the number, weight, or measure of the mass. If the mass contains less than the number, weight, or measure bought, the buyer becomes the owner of the whole mass and the seller is bound to make good the deficiency from similar goods unless a contrary intent appears.

SEC. 7. Destruction of goods sold: (1) Where the parties purport to sell specific goods, and the goods without the knowledge of the seller have wholly perished at the time when the agreement is made, the agreement is void.

(2) Where the parties purport to sell specific goods, and the goods without the knowledge of the seller have perished in part or have wholly or in a material part so deteriorated in quality as to be substantially changed in character, the buyer may at his option treat the sale—

(a) As avoided; or

(b) As transferring the property in all of the existing goods or in so much thereof as have not deteriorated, and as binding the buyer to pay the full agreed price if the sale was indivisible, or to pay the agreed price for the goods in which the property passes if the sale was divisible.

SEC. 8. Destruction of goods contracted to be sold: (1) Where there is a contract to sell specific goods, and subsequently, but before the risk passes to the buyer, without any fault on the part of the seller or the buyer, the goods wholly perish, the contract is thereby voided.

(2) Where there is a contract to sell specific goods, and subsequently, but before the risk passes to the buyer, without any fault of the seller or the buyer, part of the goods perish or the whole or a material part of the goods so deteriorate in quality as to be substantially changed in character, the buyer may at his option treat the contract—

(a) As avoided; or

(b) As binding the seller to transfer the property in all of the existing goods or in so much thereof as have not deteriorated, and as binding the buyer to pay the full agreed price if the contract was indivisible, or to pay the agreed price for so much of the goods as the seller, by the buyer's option, is bound to transfer if the contract was divisible.

THE PRICE

SEC. 9. Definition and ascertainment of price: (1) The price may be fixed by the contract, or may be left to be fixed in such manner as may be agreed, or it may be determined by the course of dealing between the parties.

(2) The price may be made payable in any personal property.

(3) Where transferring or promising to transfer any interest in real estate constitutes the whole or part of the consideration for transferring or for promising to transfer the property in goods, this act shall not apply.

(4) Where the price is not determined in accordance with the foregoing provisions, the buyer must pay a reasonable price. What is a reasonable price is a question of fact dependent on the circumstances of each particular case.

SEC. 10. Sale at a valuation: (1) Where there is a contract to sell or a sale of goods at a price or on terms to be fixed by a third person, and such third person without fault of the seller or the buyer cannot or does not fix the price or terms, the contract or the sale is thereby avoided; but if the goods or any part thereof have been delivered to and appropriated by the buyer he must pay a reasonable price therefor.

(2) Where such third person is prevented from fixing the price or terms by fault of the seller or the buyer, the party not in fault may have such remedies against the party in fault as are allowed by parts IV and V of this act.

CONDITIONS AND WARRANTIES

SEC. 11. Effect of conditions: (1) Where the obligation of either party to a contract to sell or a sale is subject to any condition which is not performed, such party may refuse to proceed with the contract or sale or he may waive performance of the condition. If the other party has promised that the condition should happen or be performed, such first-mentioned party may also treat the nonperformance of the condition as a breach of warranty.

(2) Where the property in the goods has not passed, the buyer may treat the fulfillment by the seller of his obligations to furnish goods as described and as warranted expressly or by implication in the contract to sell as a condition of the obligation of the buyer to perform his promise to accept and pay for the goods.

SEC. 12. Definition of express warranty: Any affirmation of fact or any promise by the seller relating to the goods is an express warranty if the natural tendency of such affirmation or promise is to induce the buyer to purchase the goods, and if the buyer purchases the goods relying thereon. No affirmation of the value of the goods, nor any statement purporting to be a statement of the seller's opinion only, shall be construed as a warranty.

SEC. 13. Implied warranties of title: In a contract to sell or a sale, unless a contrary intention appears, there is—

(1) An implied warranty on the part of the seller that in case of a sale he has a right to sell the goods, and that in case of a contract to sell he will have a right to sell the goods at the time when the property is to pass;

(2) An implied warranty that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods as against any lawful claims existing at the time of the sale;

(3) An implied warranty that the goods shall be free at the time of the sale from any charge or encumbrance in favor of any third person, not declared or known to the buyer before or at the time when the contract or sale is made.

(4) This section shall not, however, be held to render liable a sheriff, auctioneer, mortgagee, or other person professing to sell by virtue of authority in fact or law, goods in which a third person has a legal or equitable interest.

SEC. 14. Implied warranty in sale by description: Where there is a contract to sell or a sale of goods by description, there is an implied warranty that the goods shall correspond with the description and if the contract or sale be by sample, as well as by description, it is not sufficient that the bulk of the goods corresponds with the sample if the goods do not also correspond with the description.

SEC. 15. Implied warranties of quality: Subject to the provisions of this act and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract to sell or a sale, except as follows:

(1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, and it appears that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment (whether he be the grower or manufacturer or not), there is an implied warranty that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose.

(2) Where the goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the grower or manufacturer or not), there is an implied warranty that the goods shall be merchantable quality.

(3) If the buyer has examined the goods, there is no implied warranty as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed.

(4) In the case of a contract to sell or a sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied warranty as to its fitness for any particular purpose.

(5) An implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for a particular purpose may be annexed by the usage of trade.

(6) An express warranty or condition does not negative a warranty or condition implied under this act unless inconsistent therewith.

SALE BY SAMPLE

SEC. 16. Implied warranties in sale by sample: In the case of a contract to sell or a sale by sample—

(a) There is an implied warranty that the bulk shall correspond with the sample in quality.

(b) There is an implied warranty that the buyer shall have a reasonable opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sample, except so far as otherwise provided in section 47 (3).

(c) If the seller is a dealer in goods of that kind, there is an implied warranty that the goods shall be free from any defect rendering them unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample.

PART II

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY AS BETWEEN SELLER AND BUYER

SEC. 17. No property passes until goods are ascertained: Where there is a contract to sell unascertained goods no property in the goods is transferred to the buyer unless and until the goods are ascertained, but property in an undivided share of ascertained goods may be transferred as provided in section 6.

SEC. 18. Property in specific goods passes when parties so intend: (1) Where there is a contract to sell specific or ascertained goods, the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred.

(2) For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, regard shall be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, usages of trade, and the circumstances of the case.

SEC. 19. Rules for ascertaining intention: Unless a different intention appears, the following are rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer:

Rule 1. Where there is an unconditional contract to sell specific goods, in a deliverable state, the property in the goods passes to the buyer when the contract is made and it is immaterial whether the time of payment, or the time of delivery, or both, be postponed.

Rule 2. Where there is a contract to sell specific goods and the seller is bound to do something to the goods, for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until such thing is done.

Rule 3. (1) When goods are delivered to the buyer "on sale or return", or on other terms indicating an intention to make a present sale, but to give the buyer an option to return the goods instead of paying the price, the property passes to the buyer on delivery, but he may revert the property in the seller by returning or tendering the goods within the time fixed in the contract, or, if no time has been fixed, within a reasonable time.

(2) When goods are delivered to the buyer on approval or on trial or on satisfaction, or other similar terms, the property therein passes to the buyer—

(a) When he signifies his approval or acceptance to the seller or does any other act adopting the transaction;

(b) If he does not signify his approval or acceptance to the seller, but retains the goods without giving notice of rejection, then if a time has been fixed for the return of the goods, on the expiration of such time, and, if no time has been fixed, on the expiration of a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time is a question of fact.

Rule 4. (1) Where there is a contract to sell unascertained or future goods by description, and goods of that description and in a deliverable state are unconditionally appropriated to the contract, either by the seller with the assent of the buyer, or by the buyer with the assent of the seller, the property in the goods thereupon passes to the buyer. Such assent may be expressed or implied, and may be given either before or after the appropriation is made.

(2) Where, in pursuance of a contract to sell, the seller delivers the goods to the buyer, or to a carrier or other bailee (whether named by the buyer or not) for the purpose of transmission to or holding for the buyer, he is presumed to have unconditionally appropriated the goods to the contract, except in the cases provided for in the next rule and in section 20. This presumption is applicable, although by the terms of the contract, the buyer is to pay the price before receiving delivery of the goods, and the goods are marked with the words "collect on delivery" or their equivalents.

Rule 5. If the contract to sell requires the seller to deliver the goods to the buyer, or at a particular place, or to pay the freight or cost of transportation to the buyer, or to a particular place, the property does not pass until the goods have been delivered to the buyer or reached the place agreed upon.

Sec. 20. Reservation of right of possession or property when goods are shipped: (1) Where there is a contract to sell specific goods, or where goods are subsequently appropriated to the contract, the seller may, by the terms of the contract or appropriation, reserve the right of possession or property in the goods until certain conditions have been fulfilled. The right of possession or property may be thus reserved notwithstanding the delivery of the goods to the buyer or to a carrier or other bailee for the purpose of transmission to the buyer.

(2) Where goods are shipped, and by the bill of lading the goods are deliverable to the seller or his agent, or to the order of the seller or of his agent, the seller thereby reserves the property in the goods. But if, except for the form of the bill of lading, the property would have passed to the buyer on shipment of the goods, the seller's property in the goods shall be deemed to be only for the purpose of securing performance by the buyer of his obligations under the contract.

(3) Where goods are shipped, and by the bill of lading the goods are deliverable to the order of the buyer or of his agent, but possession of the bill of lading is retained by the seller or his agent, the seller thereby reserves a right to the possession of the goods as against the buyer.

(4) Where the seller of goods draws on the buyer for the price and transmits the bill of exchange and bill of lading together to the buyer to secure acceptance or payment of the bill of exchange, the buyer is bound to return the bill of lading if he does not honor the bill of exchange, and if he wrongfully retains the bill of lading he acquires no added right thereby. If, however, the bill of lading provides that the goods are deliverable to the buyer or to the order of the buyer, or is endorsed in blank, or to the buyer by the consignee named therein, one who purchases in good faith, for value, the bill of lading, or goods from the buyer will obtain the property in the goods, although the bill of exchange has not been honored, provided that such purchaser has received delivery of the bill of lading endorsed by the consignee named therein, or of the goods, without notice of the facts, making the transfer wrongful.

Sec. 21. Sale by auction: In the case of a sale by auction—

(1) Where goods are put up for sale by auction in lots, each lot is the subject of a separate contract of sale.

(2) A sale by auction is complete when the auctioneer announces its completion by the fall of the hammer, or in other customary manner. Until such announcement is made, any bidder may retract his bid; and the auctioneer may withdraw the goods from sale unless the auction has been announced to be without reserve.

(3) A right to bid may be reserved expressly by or on behalf of the seller.

(4) Where notice has not been given that a sale by auction is subject to a right to bid on behalf of the seller, it shall not be lawful for the seller to bid himself or to employ or induce any person to bid at such sale on his behalf, or for the auctioneer to employ or induce any person to bid at such sale on behalf of the seller or knowingly to take any bid from the seller or any person employed by him. Any sale contravening this rule may be treated as fraudulent by the buyer.

Sec. 22. Risk of loss: Unless otherwise agreed, the goods remain at the seller's risk until the property therein is transferred to the buyer, but when the property therein is transferred to the buyer the goods are at the buyer's risk whether delivery has been made or not, except that—

(a) Where delivery of the goods has been made to the buyer or to a bailee for the buyer, in pursuance of the contract and the property in the goods has been retained by the seller merely to secure performance by the buyer of his obligations under the contract, the goods are at the buyer's risk from the time of such delivery.

(b) Where delivery has been delayed through the fault of either the buyer or seller the goods are at the risk of the party in fault as regards any loss which might not have occurred but for such fault.

TRANSFER OF TITLE

Sec. 23. Sale by a person not the owner: (1) Subject to the provisions of this act, where goods are sold by a person who is not the owner thereof, and who does not sell them under the authority or with the consent of the owner, the buyer acquires no better title to the goods than the seller had, unless the owner of the goods is by his conduct precluded from denying the seller's authority to sell.

(2) Nothing in this act, however, shall affect—

(a) The provisions of any factors' acts, recording acts, or any enactment enabling the apparent owner of goods to dispose of them as if he were the true owner thereof.

(b) The validity of any contract to sell or sale under any special common law or statutory power of sale or under the order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 24. Sale by one having a voidable title: Where the seller of goods has a voidable title thereto, but his title has not been avoided at the time of the sale, the buyer acquires a good title to the goods, provided he buys them in good faith, for value, and without notice of the seller's defect of title.

Sec. 25. Sale by seller in possession of goods already sold: Where a person having sold goods continues in possession of the goods, or of negotiable documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by an agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving and paying value for the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same.

Sec. 26. Creditors' rights against sold goods in seller's possession: Where a person having sold goods continues in possession of the goods, or of negotiable documents of title to the goods, and such retention of possession is fraudulent in fact or is deemed fraudulent under any rule of law, a creditor or creditors of the seller may treat the sale as void.

Sec. 27. Definition of negotiable documents of title: A document of title in which it is stated that the goods referred to therein will be delivered to the bearer, or to the order of any person named in such document, is a negotiable document of title within the meaning of this act.

Sec. 28. Negotiation of negotiable documents by delivery: A negotiable document of title may be negotiated by delivery—

(a) Where by the terms of the document the carrier, warehouseman, or other bailee issuing the same undertakes to deliver the goods to the bearer; or

(b) Where by the terms of the document the carrier, warehouseman, or other bailee issuing the same, undertakes to deliver the goods to the order of a specified person, and such person or a subsequent endorsee of the document has endorsed it in blank or to the bearer.

Where by the terms of a negotiable document of title the goods are deliverable to bearer or where a negotiable document of title has been endorsed in blank or to bearer, any holder may endorse the same to himself or to any specified person, and in such case the document shall thereafter be negotiated only by the endorsement of such endorsee.

Sec. 29. Negotiation of negotiable documents by endorsement: A negotiable document of title may be negotiated by the endorsement of the person to whose order the goods are by the terms of the document deliverable. Such endorsement may be in blank, to bearer, or to a specified person. If endorsed to a specified person, it may be again negotiated by the endorsement of such person in blank, to bearer, or to another specified person. Subsequent negotiations may be made in like manner.

Sec. 30. Negotiable documents of title marked "Not negotiable": If a document of title which contains an undertaking by a carrier, warehouseman, or other bailee to deliver the goods to the bearer, to a specified person or order, or to the order of a specified person, or which contains words of like import, has placed upon it the words "not negotiable", "nonnegotiable", or the like, such a document may nevertheless be negotiated by the holder and is a negotiable document of title within the meaning of this act. But nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting or defining the effect upon the obligations of the carrier, warehouseman, or other bailee issuing a document of title or placing thereon the words "not negotiable", "nonnegotiable", or the like.

Sec. 31. Transfer of nonnegotiable documents: A document of title which is not in such form that it can be negotiated by delivery may be transferred by the holder by delivery to a purchaser or donee. A nonnegotiable document cannot be negotiated and the endorsement of such a document gives the transferee no additional right.

Sec. 32. Who may negotiate a document: A negotiable document may be negotiated by any person in possession of the same, however such possession may have been acquired if, by the terms of the document, the bailee issuing it undertakes to deliver the goods to the order of such person, or if at the time of negotiation the document is in such form that it may be negotiated by delivery.

Sec. 33. Rights of person to whom document has been negotiated: A person to whom a negotiable document of title has been duly negotiated acquires thereby—

(a) Such title to the goods as the person negotiating the document to him had or had ability to convey to a purchaser in good faith for value and also such title to the goods as the person to whose order the goods were to be delivered by the terms of the document had or had ability to convey to a purchaser in good faith for value; and

(b) The direct obligation of the bailee issuing the document to hold possession of the goods for him according to the terms of the document as fully as if such bailee had contracted directly with him.

SEC. 34. Rights of person to whom document has been transferred: A person to whom a document of title has been transferred, but not negotiated, acquires thereby, as against the transferor, the title to the goods, subject to the terms of any agreement with the transferor.

If the document is nonnegotiable, such person also acquires the right to notify the bailee who issued the document of the transfer thereof, and thereby to acquire the direct obligation of such bailee to hold possession of the goods for him according to the terms of the document.

Prior to the notification of such bailee by the transferor or transferee of a nonnegotiable document of title, the title of the transferee to the goods and the right to acquire the obligation of such bailee may be defeated by the levy of an attachment or execution upon the goods by a creditor of the transferor, or by a notification to such bailee by the transferor or a subsequent purchaser from the transferor of a subsequent sale of the goods by the transferor.

SEC. 35. Transfer of negotiable document without endorsement: Where a negotiable document of title is transferred for value by delivery, and the endorsement of the transferor is essential for negotiation, the transferee acquires a right against the transferor to compel him to endorse the document unless a contrary intention appears. The negotiation shall take effect as of the time when the endorsement is actually made.

SEC. 36. Warranties on sale of document: A person who for value negotiates or transfers a document of title by endorsement or delivery, including one who assigns for value a claim secured by a document of title unless a contrary intention appears, warrants:

- (a) That the document is genuine;
- (b) That he has a legal right to negotiate or transfer it;
- (c) That he has knowledge of no fact which would impair the validity or worth of the document; and
- (d) That he has a right to transfer the title to the goods and that the goods are merchantable or fit for a particular purpose, whenever such warranties would have been implied if the contract of the parties had been to transfer without a document of title the goods represented thereby.

SEC. 37. Endorser not a guarantor: The endorsement of a document of title shall not make the endorser liable for any failure on the part of the bailee who issued the document or previous endorsers thereof to fulfill their respective obligations.

SEC. 38. When negotiation not impaired by fraud, mistake, or duress: The validity of the negotiation of a negotiable document of title is not impaired by the fact that the negotiation was a breach of duty on the part of the person making the negotiation, or by the fact that the owner of the document was deprived of the possession of the same by loss, theft, fraud, accident, mistake, duress, or conversion, if the person to whom the document was negotiated or a person to whom the document was subsequently negotiated paid value therefor in good faith without notice of the breach of duty, or loss, theft, fraud, accident, mistake, duress, or conversion.

SEC. 39. Attachment or levy upon goods for which a negotiable document has been issued: If goods are delivered to a bailee by the owner or by a person whose act in conveying the title to them to a purchaser in good faith for value would bind the owner and a negotiable document of title is issued for them, they cannot thereafter, while in the possession of such bailee, be attached by garnishment or otherwise or be levied under an execution unless the document be first surrendered to the bailee or its negotiation enjoined. The bailee shall in no case be compelled to deliver up the actual possession of the goods until the document is surrendered to him or impounded by the court.

SEC. 40. Creditors' remedies to reach negotiable documents: A creditor whose debtor is the owner of a negotiable document of title shall be entitled to such aid from courts of appropriate jurisdiction by injunction and otherwise in attaching such document or in satisfying the claim by means thereof as is allowed at law or in equity in regard to property which cannot readily be attached or levied upon by ordinary legal process.

PART III

PERFORMANCE OF THE CONTRACT

SEC. 41. Seller must deliver and buyer accept goods: It is the duty of the seller to deliver the goods, and of the buyer to accept and pay for them, in accordance with the terms of the contract to sell or sale.

SEC. 42. Delivery and payment are concurrent conditions: Unless otherwise agreed, delivery of the goods and payment of the price are concurrent conditions; that is to say, the seller must be ready and willing to give possession of the goods to the buyer in exchange for the price, and the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price in exchange for possession of the goods.

SEC. 43. Place, time, and manner of delivery: (1) Whether it is for the buyer to take possession of the goods or for the seller to send them to the buyer is a question depending in each case on the contract, express or implied, between the parties. Apart from any such contract, express or implied, or usage of trade to the contrary, the place of delivery is the seller's place of business if he have one, and, if not, his residence; but in case of a contract to sell or a sale of specific goods, which to the knowledge of the parties when the contract or the sale was made were in some other place, then that place is the place of delivery.

(2) Where by a contract to sell or a sale the seller is bound to send the goods to the buyer, but no time for sending them is fixed, the seller is bound to send them within a reasonable time.

(3) Where the goods at the time of sale are in the possession of a third person, the seller has not fulfilled his obligation to deliver to the buyer unless and until such third person acknowledges to the buyer that he holds the goods on the buyer's behalf; but as against all others than the seller the buyer shall be regarded as having received delivery from the time when such third person first has notice of the sale. Nothing in this section, however, shall affect the operation of the issue or transfer of any document of title to goods.

(4) Demand or tender of delivery may be treated as ineffectual unless made at a reasonable hour. What is a reasonable hour is a question of fact.

(5) Unless otherwise agreed, the expenses of and incidental to putting the goods into a deliverable state must be borne by the seller.

SEC. 44. Delivery of wrong quantity: (1) Where the seller delivers to the buyer a quantity of goods less than he contracted to sell, the buyer may reject them, but if the buyer accepts or retains the goods so delivered, knowing that the seller is not going to perform the contract in full, he must pay for them at the contract rate. If, however, the buyer has used or disposed of the goods delivered before he knows that the seller is not going to perform his contract in full, the buyer shall not be liable for more than the fair value of him of the goods so received.

(2) Where the seller delivers to the buyer a quantity of goods larger than he contracted to sell, the buyer may accept the goods included in the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole. If the buyer accepts the whole of the goods so delivered, he must pay for them at the contract rate.

(3) Where the seller delivers to the buyer the goods he contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract, the buyer may accept the goods which are in accordance with the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole.

(4) The provisions of this section are subject to any usage of trade, special agreement, or course of dealing between the parties.

SEC. 45. Delivery in installments: (1) Unless otherwise agreed, the buyer of goods is not bound to accept delivery thereof by installments.

(2) Where there is a contract to sell goods to be delivered by stated installments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more installments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more installments, it depends in each case on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case, whether the breach of contract is so material as to justify the injured party in refusing to proceed further and suing for damages for breach of the entire contract, or whether the breach is severable, giving rise to a claim for compensation but not to a right to treat the whole contract as broken.

SEC. 46. Delivery to a carrier on behalf of the buyer: (1) Where, in pursuance of a contract to sell or a sale, the seller is authorized or required to send the goods to the buyer, delivery of the goods to a carrier, whether named by the buyer or not, for the purpose of transmission to the buyer is deemed to be a delivery of the goods to the buyer, except in the cases provided for in section 19, rule 5, or unless a contrary intent appears.

(2) Unless otherwise authorized by the buyer, the seller must make such contract with the carrier on behalf of the buyer as may be reasonable, having regard to the nature of the goods and the other circumstances of the case. If the seller omits so to do, and the goods are lost or damaged in course of transit, the buyer may decline to treat the delivery to the carrier as a delivery to himself, or may hold the seller responsible in damages.

(3) Unless otherwise agreed, where goods are sent by the seller to the buyer under circumstances in which the seller knows or ought to know that it is usual to insure, the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure them during their transit, and, if the seller fails to do so, the goods shall be deemed to be at his risk during such transit.

SEC. 47. Right to examine the goods: (1) Where goods are delivered to the buyer which he has not previously examined, he is not deemed to have accepted them unless and until he has had a reasonable opportunity of examining them for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract.

(2) Unless otherwise agreed, when the seller tenders delivery of goods to the buyer, he is bound, on request, to afford the buyer a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract.

(3) Where goods are delivered to a carrier by the seller, in accordance with an order from or agreement with the buyer, upon the terms that the goods shall not be delivered by the carrier to the buyer until he has paid the price, whether such terms are indicated by marking the goods with the words "collect on delivery", or otherwise, the buyer is not entitled to examine the goods before payment of the price in the absence of agreement permitting such examination.

SEC. 48. What constitutes acceptance: The buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods when he intimates to the seller that he has accepted them, or when the goods have been delivered to him, and he does any act in relation to them which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or when, after the lapse of a reasonable time, he retains the goods without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them.

SEC. 49. Acceptance does not bar action for damages: In the absence of express or implied agreement of the parties, acceptance of the goods by the buyer shall not discharge the seller from liability in damages or other legal remedy for breach of any promise or warranty in the contract to sell or the sale. But if, after acceptance of the goods, the buyer fails to give notice to the seller of the breach of any promise or warranty within a reasonable time after the buyer knows, or ought to know, of such breach, the seller shall not be liable therefor.

SEC. 50. Buyer is not bound to return goods wrongly delivered: Unless otherwise agreed, where goods are delivered to the buyer, and he refused to accept them, having the right so to do, he is not bound to return them to the seller, but it is sufficient if he notifies the seller that he refuses to accept them.

SEC. 51. Buyer's liability for failing to accept delivery: When the seller is ready and willing to deliver the goods, and requests the buyer to take delivery, and the buyer does not within a reasonable time after such request take delivery of the goods, he is liable to the seller for any loss occasioned by his neglect or refusal to take delivery, and also for a reasonable charge for the care and custody of the goods. If the neglect or refusal of the buyer to take delivery amounts to a repudiation or breach of the entire contract, the seller shall have the right against the goods and on the contract hereinafter provided in favor of the seller when the buyer is in default.

PART IV

RIGHTS OF UNPAID SELLER AGAINST THE GOODS

SEC. 52. Definition of unpaid seller: (1) The seller of goods is deemed to be an unpaid seller within the meaning of this act—

(a) When the whole of the price has not been paid or tendered.
(b) When a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument has been received as conditional payment, and the condition on which it was received has been broken by reason of the dishonor of the instrument, the insolvency of the buyer, or otherwise.

(2) In this part of this act the term "seller" includes an agent of the seller to whom the bill of lading has been endorsed, or a consignor or agent who has himself paid, or is directly responsible for, the price, or any other person who is in the position of a seller.

SEC. 53. Remedies of an unpaid seller: (1) Subject to the provisions of this act, notwithstanding that the property in the goods may have passed to the buyer, the unpaid seller of goods, as such, has—

(a) A lien on the goods or right to retain them for the price while he is in possession of them;

(b) In case of insolvency of the buyer, the right of stopping the goods in transitu after he has parted with the possession of them;

(c) A right of resale as limited by this act; and
(d) A right to rescind the sale as limited by this act.

(2) Where the property in goods has not passed to the buyer, the unpaid seller has, in addition to his other remedies, a right of withholding delivery similar to and coextensive with his rights of lien and stoppage in transitu where the property has passed to the buyer.

UNPAID SELLER'S LIEN

SEC. 54. When right of lien may be exercised: (1) Subject to the provisions of this act, the unpaid seller of goods who is in possession of them is entitled to retain possession of them until payment or tender of the price in the following cases, namely—

(a) Where the goods have been sold without any stipulation as to credit;

(b) Where the goods have been sold on credit, but the term of credit has expired; and

(c) Where the buyer becomes insolvent.

(2) The seller may exercise his right of lien, notwithstanding that he is in possession of the goods as agent or bailee for the buyer.

SEC. 55. Lien after part delivery: Where an unpaid seller has made part delivery of the goods, he may exercise his right of lien on the remainder, unless such part delivery has been made under such circumstances as to show an intent to waive the lien or right of retention.

SEC. 56. When lien is lost: (1) The unpaid seller of goods loses his lien thereon—

(a) When he delivers the goods to a carrier or other bailee for the purpose of transmission to the buyer without reserving the property in the goods or the right to the possession thereof;

(b) When the buyer or his agent lawfully obtains possession of the goods; and

(c) By waiver thereof.

(2) The unpaid seller of goods, having a lien thereon, does not lose his lien by reason only that he has obtained judgment or decree for the price of goods.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSIT

SEC. 57. Seller may stop goods on buyer's insolvency: Subject to the provisions of this act, when the buyer of goods is or becomes insolvent, the unpaid seller who has parted with the possession of the goods has the right of stopping them in transitu; that is to say, he may resume possession of the goods at any time while they are in transit, and he will then become entitled to the same rights in regard to the goods as he would have had if he had never parted with the possession.

SEC. 58. When goods are in transit: (1) Goods are in transit within the meaning of section 57—

(a) From the time when they are delivered to a carrier by land or water, or other bailee for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, until the buyer, or his agent in that behalf, takes delivery of them from such carrier or other bailee; and

(b) If the goods are rejected by the buyer, and the carrier or other bailee continues in possession of them, even if the seller has refused to receive them back.

(2) Goods are no longer in transit within the meaning of section 57—

(a) If the buyer, or his agent in that behalf, obtains delivery of the goods before their arrival at the appointed destination;

(b) If, after the arrival of the goods at the appointed destination, the carrier or other bailee acknowledges to the buyer or his agent that he holds the goods on his behalf and continues in possession of them as bailee for the buyer or his agent; and it is immaterial that a further destination for the goods may have been indicated by the buyer; and

(c) If the carrier or other bailee wrongfully refuses to deliver the goods to the buyer or his agent in that behalf.

(3) If goods are delivered to a ship chartered by the buyer, it is a question depending on the circumstances of the particular case, whether they are in the possession of the master as a carrier or as agent of the buyer.

(4) If part delivery of the goods has been made to the buyer, or his agent in that behalf, the remainder of the goods may be stopped in transitu, unless such part delivery has been made under such circumstances as to show an agreement with the buyer to give up possession of the whole of the goods.

SEC. 59. Ways of exercising the right to stop: (1) The unpaid seller may exercise his right of stoppage in transitu either by obtaining actual possession of the goods or by giving notice of his claim to the carrier or other bailee in whose possession the goods are. Such notice may be given either to the person in actual possession of the goods or to his principal. In the latter case the notice, to be effectual, must be given at such time and under such circumstances that the principal, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, may prevent a delivery to the buyer.

(2) When notice of stoppage in transitu is given by the seller to the carrier, or other bailee in possession of the goods, he must redeliver the goods to, or according to the directions of, the seller. The expenses of such delivery must be borne by the seller. If, however, a negotiable document of title representing the goods has been issued by the carrier or other bailee, he shall not be obliged to deliver or justified in delivering the goods to the seller unless such document is first surrendered for cancellation.

RESALE BY THE SELLER

SEC. 60. When and how resale may be made: (1) Where the goods are of perishable nature, or where the seller expressly reserves the right of resale in case the buyer should make default, or where the buyer has been in default in the payment of the price an unreasonable time, an unpaid seller having a right of lien or having stopped the goods in transitu may resell the goods. He shall not thereafter be liable to the original buyer upon the contract to sell or the sale or for any profit made by such resale, but may recover from the buyer damages for any loss occasioned by the breach of the contract or the sale.

(2) Where a resale is made, as authorized in this section, the buyer acquires a good title as against the original buyer.

(3) It is not essential to the validity of a resale that notice of an intention to resell the goods be given by the seller to the original buyer. But where the right to resell is not based on the perishable nature of the goods or upon an express provision of the contract or the sale, the giving or failure to give such notice shall be relevant in any issue involving the question whether the buyer had been in default an unreasonable time before the sale was made.

(4) It is not essential to the validity of a resale that notice of the time and place of such resale should be given by the seller to the original buyer.

(5) The seller is bound to exercise reasonable care and judgment in making a resale, and subject to this requirement may make a resale either by public or private sale.

RESCISSION BY THE SELLER

SEC. 61. When and how the seller may rescind the sale: (1) An unpaid seller having the right of lien or having stopped the goods in transitu may rescind the transfer of title and resume the property in the goods, where he expressly reserved the right to do so in case the buyer should make default, or where the buyer has been in default in the payment of the price an unreasonable time. The seller shall not thereafter be liable to the buyer upon the contract to sell or the sale, but may recover from the buyer damages for any loss occasioned by the breach of the contract or the sale.

(2) The transfer of title shall not be held to have been rescinded by an unpaid seller until he has manifested by notice to the buyer or by some other overt act an intention to rescind. It is not necessary that such overt act should be communicated to the buyer, but the giving or failure to give notice to the buyer of the intention to rescind shall be relevant in any issue involving the question whether the buyer had been in default an unreasonable time before the right of rescission was asserted.

SEC. 62. Effect of sale of goods subject to lien or stoppage in transitu: Subject to the provisions of this act, the unpaid seller's right of lien or stoppage in transitu is not affected by any sale, or other disposition of the goods which the buyer may have made, unless the seller has assented thereto.

If, however, a negotiable document of title has been issued for goods, no seller's lien or right of stoppage in transitu shall defeat the right of any purchaser for value in good faith to whom such document has been negotiated, whether such negotiations be prior or subsequent to the notification to the carrier, or other bailee who issued such document, of the seller's claim to a lien or right of stoppage in transitu.

PART V

ACTION FOR BREACH OF THE CONTRACT; REMEDIES OF THE SELLER

SEC. 63. Action for the price: (1) Where, under a contract to sell or a sale, the property in the goods has passed to the buyer, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay for the goods according to the terms of the contract or the sale, the seller may maintain an action against him for the price of the goods.

(2) Where, under a contract to sell or a sale, the price is payable on a day certain, irrespective of delivery or of transfer of title, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay such price, the seller may maintain an action for the price, although the property in the goods has not passed, and the goods have not been appropriated to the contract. But it shall be a defense to such an action that the seller at any time before judgment in such action has manifested an inability to perform the contract or the sale on his part or an intention not to perform it.

(3) Although the property in the goods has not passed, if they cannot readily be resold for a reasonable price, and if the provisions of section 64 (4) are not applicable, the seller may offer to deliver the goods to the buyer, and, if the buyer refuses to receive them, may notify the buyer that the goods are thereafter held by the seller as bailee for the buyer. Thereafter the seller may treat the goods as the buyer's and may maintain an action for the price.

SEC. 64. Action for damages for nonacceptance of the goods: (1) Where the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to accept and pay for the goods, the seller may maintain an action against him for damages for nonacceptance.

(2) The measure of damages is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the buyer's breach of contract.

(3) Where there is an available market for the goods in question, the measure of damages is, in the absence of special circumstances, showing proximate damage of a greater amount, the difference between the contract price and the market or current price at the time or times when the goods ought to have been accepted, or, if no time was fixed for acceptance, then at the time of the refusal to accept.

(4) If, while labor or expense of material amount are necessary on the part of the seller to enable him to fulfill his obligations under the contract to sell or the sale, the buyer repudiates the contract or the sale, or notifies the seller to proceed no further therewith, the buyer shall be liable to the seller for no greater damages than the seller would have suffered if he did nothing toward carrying out the contract or the sale after receiving notice of the buyer's repudiation or countermand. The profit the seller would have made if the contract or the sale had been fully performed shall be considered in estimating such damages.

SEC. 65. When seller may rescind contract or sale: Where the goods have not been delivered to the buyer, and the buyer has repudiated the contract to sell or sale, or has manifested his inability to perform his obligations thereunder, or has committed a material breach thereof, the seller may totally rescind the contract or the sale by giving notice of his election so to do to the buyer.

REMEDIES OF THE BUYER

SEC. 66. Action for converting or detaining goods: Where the property in the goods has passed to the buyer and the seller wrongfully neglects or refuses to deliver the goods, the buyer may maintain any action allowed by law to the owner of goods of similar kind when wrongfully converted or withheld.

SEC. 67. Action for failing to deliver goods: (1) Where the property in the goods has not passed to the buyer, and the seller wrongfully neglects or refuses to deliver the goods, the buyer may maintain an action against the seller for damages for non-delivery.

(2) The measure of damages is the loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller's breach of contract.

(3) Where there is an available market for the goods in question, the measure of damages, in the absence of special circumstances showing proximate damages of a greater amount, is the difference between the contract price and the market or current price of the goods at the time or times when they ought to have been delivered, or, if no time was fixed, then at the time of the refusal to deliver.

SEC. 68. Specific performance: Where the seller has broken a contract to deliver specific or ascertained goods, a court having the powers of a court of equity may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the buyer, by its judgment or decree direct that the contract shall be performed specifically, without giving the seller the option of retaining the goods on payment of damages. The judgment or decree may be unconditional, or upon such terms and conditions as to damages, payment of the price, and otherwise as to the court may seem just.

SEC. 69. Remedies for breach of warranty: (1) Where there is a breach of warranty by the seller, the buyer may, at his election—

(a) Accept or keep the goods and set up against the seller the breach of warranty by way of recoupment in diminution or extinction of the price;

(b) Accept or keep the goods and maintain an action against the seller for damages for the breach of warranty;

(c) Refuse to accept the goods, if the property therein has not passed, and maintain an action against the seller for damages for the breach of warranty; and

(d) Rescind the contract to sell or the sale and refuse to receive the goods, or, if the goods have already been received, return them or offer to return them to the seller and recover the price or any part thereof which has been paid.

(2) When the buyer has claimed and has been granted a remedy in any one of these ways, no other remedy can thereafter be granted.

(3) Where the goods have been delivered to the buyer, he cannot rescind the sale if he knew of the breach of warranty when he accepted the goods, or if he fails to notify the seller within a reasonable time of the election to rescind, or if he fails to return or to offer to return the goods to the seller in substantially as good condition as they were in at the time the property was transferred to the buyer. But if deterioration or injury of the goods is due to the breach of warranty, such deterioration or injury shall not prevent the buyer from returning or offering to return the goods to the seller and rescinding the sale.

(4) Where the buyer is entitled to rescind the sale and elects to do so, the buyer shall cease to be liable for the price upon returning or offering to return the goods. If the price or any part thereof has already been paid, the seller shall be liable to repay so much thereof as has been paid, concurrently with the return of the goods, or immediately after an offer to return the goods in exchange for repayment of the price.

(5) Where the buyer is entitled to rescind the sale and elects to do so, if the seller refuses to accept an offer of the buyer to return the goods, the buyer shall thereafter be deemed to hold the goods as bailee for the seller, but subject to a lien to secure the repayment of any portion of the price which has been paid, and with the remedies for the enforcement of such lien allowed to an unpaid seller by section 53.

(6) The measure of damages for breach of warranty is the loss directly and naturally resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the breach of warranty.

(7) In the case of breach of warranty of quality, such loss, in the absence of special circumstances showing proximate damage of a greater amount, is the difference between the value of the goods at the time of delivery to the buyer and the value they would have had if they had answered to the warranty.

SEC. 70. Interest and special damages: Nothing in this act shall affect the right of the buyer or the seller to recover interest or special damages in any case where by law interest or special damages may be recoverable, or to recover money paid where the consideration for the payment of it has failed.

PART VI

INTERPRETATION

SEC. 71. Variation of implied obligations: Where any right, duty, or liability would arise under a contract to sell or a sale by implication of law, it may be negated or varied by express agreement or by the course of dealing between the parties, or by custom, if the custom be such as to bind both parties to the contract or the sale.

SEC. 72. Rights may be enforced by action: Where any right, duty, or liability is declared by this act, it may, unless otherwise by this act provided, be enforced by action.

SEC. 73. Rule for cases not provided for by this act: In any case not provided for in this act, the rules of law and equity, including the law merchant, and in particular the rules relating to the law of principal and agent and to the effect of fraud, misrepresentation, duress or coercion, mistake, bankruptcy, or other invalidating cause, shall continue to apply to contracts to sell and to sales of goods.

SEC. 74. Interpretation shall give effect to purpose of uniformity: This act shall be so interpreted and construed as to effectuate its general purpose to make uniform the laws of those States which enact it.

SEC. 75. Provisions not applicable to mortgages: The provisions of this act relating to contracts to sell and to sales do not apply, unless so stated, to any transaction in the form of a contract to sell or a sale which is intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security.

SEC. 76. Definitions: (1) In this act, unless the context or subject matter otherwise requires—

"Action" includes counterclaim, set-off, and suit in equity.

"Buyer" means a person who buys or agrees to buy goods or any legal successor in interest of such person.

"Defendant" includes a plaintiff against whom a right of set-off or counterclaim is asserted.

"Delivery" means voluntary transfer of possession from one person to another.

"Divisible contract to sell or sale" means a contract to sell or a sale in which by its term the price for a portion or portions of the goods less than the whole is fixed or ascertainable by computation.

"Document of title to goods" includes any bill of lading, dock warrant, warehouse receipt or order for the delivery of goods, or any other document used in the ordinary course of business in the sale or transfer of goods, as proof of the possession or control of the goods, or authorizing or purporting to authorize the possessor of the document to transfer or receive, either by endorsement or by delivery, goods represented by such document.

"Fault" means wrongful act or default.

"Fungible goods" means goods of which any unit is from its nature or mercantile usage treated as the equivalent of any other unit.

"Future goods" means goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract of sale.

"Goods" include all chattels personal other than things in action and money. The term includes emblements, industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be served before sale or under the contract of sale.

"Order" in sections of this act relating to documents of title means an order by endorsement on the documents.

"Person" includes a corporation or partnership or two or more persons having a joint or common interest.

"Plaintiff" includes defendant asserting a right of set-off or counterclaim.

"Property" means the general property in goods, and not merely a special property.

"Purchaser" includes mortgagee and pledgee.

"Purchases" includes taking as a mortgagee or as a pledgee.

"Quality of goods" includes their state or condition.

"Sale" includes a bargain and sale as well as a sale and delivery.

"Seller" means a person who sells or agrees to sell goods, or any legal successor in the interest of such person.

"Specific goods" means goods identified and agreed upon at the time a contract to sell or a sale is made.

"Value" is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. An antecedent or preexisting claim, whether for money or not, constitutes value where goods or documents of titles are taken either in satisfaction thereof or as security therefor.

(2) A thing is done "in good faith" within the meaning of this act when it is in fact done honestly, whether it be done negligently or not.

(3) A person is insolvent within the meaning of this act who either has ceased to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business or cannot pay his debts as they become due, whether he has committed an act of bankruptcy or not, and whether he is insolvent within the meaning of the Federal bankruptcy law or not.

(4) Goods are in a "deliverable state" within the meaning of this act when they are in such a state that the buyer would, under the contract, be bound to take delivery of them.

Sec. 76a. Act does not apply to the existing sales or contracts to sell: None of the provisions of this act shall apply to any sale, or to any contract to sell, made prior to the taking effect of this act.

Sec. 77. Inconsistent legislation repealed: All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 78. Time when the act takes effect: This act shall take effect on the 1st day of July 1936.

Sec. 79. Name of act: This act may be cited as the "Uniform Sales Act."

ADJUSTMENT OF LOSSES BY COOPERATING MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, yesterday when Order of Business No. 500, being Senate Joint Resolution 38, was reached on the call of the calendar the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objected. I had intended to offer an amendment. I understand the Senator from Utah is willing to withdraw his objection. I ask unanimous consent to recur to the joint resolution and to have it considered at this time in order that I may offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to recurring to Calendar No. 500, being Senate Joint Resolution 38, for the purpose of consideration? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is the joint resolution still open to objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. McKELLAR. That will depend on the attitude of the Senator from North Dakota.
